hearts, by the light of God's word, the more evidently shall we see how very much reformation and renovation are needed. The suppression of gross abominations makes way for the pure administration of God's ordinances; and when the filthiness and idols are cleansed out of our hearts, the Lord will prepare his temple there, and graciously come and dwell in it. Liberality, integrity, and diligence, are commendable in every work, but especially in the work of true religion, and all undertakings immediately connected with it. When God enables us to act conscientiously, according to our present knowledge, he will in due time give us still further and clearer views of his truth. The more we become acquainted with the Scripture, the more evidently shall we perceive our own guilt and danger: but if this discovery produces godly sorrow, contrition, humiliation, and further inquiries after the will of God, an answer of peace may be expected: whilst all the curses which he has denounced, will fall upon the impenitent workers of iniquity. Though we cannot prevent the ruin of sinners in general, or of collective bodies, we should endeavour by our examples, prayers, instructions, and the regular use of authority, in domestic or in public life, to engage all we can to return to God, and walk before him, by trusting his promises and obeying his commandments.

5 And ⁿ stand in the holy place according to the divisions of the ^{*} families of the fathers of your brethren the [†] people, and after the division of the families of the Levites.

6 So ^o kill the passover, and ^p sanctify yourselves, and prepare your brethren, that they may do according to the word of the LORD by the hand of Moses.

7 And ^q Josiah [‡] gave to the people, of the flock, lambs and kids, all for the passover-offerings, for all that were present, to the number of thirty thousand, and three thousand bullocks; these were of ^r the king's substance.

8 And ^s his princes [§] gave ^t willingly unto the people, to the priests, and to the Levites: ^u Hilkiah, and Zechariah, and Jehiel, ^{*} rulers of the house of God, gave unto the priests for the passover-offerings two thousand and six hundred small cattle, and three hundred oxen.

9 Conaniah also, and Shemaiah, and Nethaneel his brethren, and Hashabiah, and Jeiel, and Jozabad, chief of the Levites, ^{||} gave unto the Levites for passover-offerings five thousand small cattle, and five hundred oxen.

10 So the service was prepared, and ^v the priests stood in their place, and the Levites in their courses, according to the king's commandment.

11 And they killed the passover, and ^z the priests sprinkled the blood from their hands, and the Levites ^a flayed them.

12 And they removed the burnt-offerings, that they might give according to the divisions of the families of the people, to offer unto the LORD, ^b as it is written in the book of Moses. And so did they with the oxen.

13 And they ^c roasted the passover with fire, according to the ordinance: but the other holy offerings ^d sod they in pots, and in caldrons, and in pans, and ^{*} divided them speedily among all the people.

14 And afterward they made ready for themselves, and for the priests: ^e because the priests the sons of Aaron were busied in offering of burnt-offerings and the fat until night; therefore the Levites prepared for themselves, and for the priests the sons of Aaron.

NOTES.

CHAP. XXXV. V. 3. It may be very probably concluded, that the most holy place had gone to decay, through neglect; and that whilst it was cleansed and repaired, the high-priest, having removed the ark, had committed it to the custody of some Levites of the family of Kohath: but when it was carried again into its place, they would be at liberty for other services, to the glory of God, and the benefit of his people Israel.

V. 4. The regulations, formed by David and Solomon, concerning the courses of the priests and Levites, were committed to writing, and preserved for them to refer to continually.

V. 5. The meaning of this verse seems to be, that the Levites should be as exact, in ascertaining to what family, or subdivision of a family, every man belonged; as those of the other tribes were: that they might know and do their proper work, without confusion or dispute, and with as much certainty and accuracy, as the others knew what lands belonged to them by inheritance. But some suppose, that the arrangement of the Levites at this time only is intended; and that they were directed to stand in regular order, according to their families, to receive the paschal lambs, which their brethren of the other tribes would bring according to their families, one for each household.

V. 7—9. The people were not at this time either very rich or very zealous, and the ordinances were expensive. That this therefore might not prevent their attendance on this solemn service, the king provided, at his own expense, an immense quantity of cattle suited to the solemnity; and after his example, the nobles and the chief of the priests and Levites, liberally assisted their poorer brethren. According to the calculation, that not fewer than ten nor more than twenty persons were to join for one lamb or kid, the numbers, given on this occasion, would suffice for above four hundred thousand persons, young and old: besides those given for peace-offerings and other sacrifices.

V. 12. The Levites separated, as speedily as they could, the parts of the peace-offerings which were to be burnt, from the rest, and added them to the other burnt-offerings; that the remainder, together with the paschal lambs, might be prepared and distributed as the occasion required.

V. 13—17: (Marg. Ref.)

V. 18. Hezekiah's remarkable passover seems to have been celebrated with greater fervency of devotion: but this of Josiah was far more regular, and in more exact conformity to the law; it was attended by vast multitudes, and the liberality of the king in furnishing the paschal lambs was without example. Nothing is recorded on this subject from the time that Israel obtained possession of the promised land: but even this passover, under Josiah, which exceeded all for several centuries, seems to have been very deficient as to genuine devotion.

V. 20—24. Josiah lived thirteen years after this remarkable passover, and zealously supported the worship of God to the end of his life. But the nation was all the while ripening for destruction; and was adjudged unworthy of so pious and excellent a prince. Josiah's conduct at the close of his life has been treated with great severity by most commentators; and he hath been charged with engaging in an unjust war, and disregarding the express command of God, which may in great measure be ascribed to the censure passed on him by the apocryphal Esdras, 'Not regarding the words of the prophet Jeremy, spoken by the † mouth of the LORD: (1 Esdras i. 28:); but the Scripture does not any where thus condemn him. Pharaoh, in marching his army through Josiah's territories against his will, certainly committed an act of hostility. It is evident that Josiah was in possession of the whole land, and not of Judah only: and probably he held the northern parts of Canaan of the king of Babylon, and was not only in alliance with him, but bound by the grant to guard his frontiers against hostile invaders. And doubtless the kings of Judah had been in some measure dependent on the kings of Assyria and Babylon, from the time of Manasseh's captivity and release. Pharaoh declared indeed by his ambassadors, that he meant not to attack Josiah, but the king of Babylon. But he was in the heart of Josiah's kingdom before he sent this embassy, and he avowed his intention of attacking his ally: and therefore Josiah may fairly, on both accounts, be justified from the charge of unjustly meddling with a war that did not belong to him; for no king upon earth would think it unjust to declare war against another prince, that should march an army into his dominions, in order to attack another that was in alliance with him. It is true that Pharaoh's ambassadors assured Josiah, that "God had commanded him to make haste;" and warned him not to "meddle with God, who was with him, that he destroyed him not:" and he is therefore said, "Not to have hearkened to the words of Necho, from the mouth of God." But Necho produced no proof, that he was a prophet of the LORD, and Sennacherib had used similar language to Hezekiah, who had paid no regard to it: (Marg. Ref.) The word used by Necho, (Elohim), may signify his gods or idols: and critics have noted, that the expression "from the mouth of God," is nowhere used in the Hebrew bible, for a revelation from the true God; but that it is always "from the mouth of the “LORD.” It is not indeed at all probable, that God had commanded Pharaoh by Jeremiah, or by any other prophet, to undertake this expedition: for in that case Josiah would doubtless have been informed, and have submitted. And if Pharaoh had received any monition in a dream or vision, which he concluded to be from the God of Israel, (and so meant something more than his own auguries and superstitions;) Josiah might not give any credit to his testimony, in matters connected with his own interest. Josiah, however, seems to have been guilty of precipitation, in not inquiring of the Lord when thus warned, before he proceeded to attack so formidable an enemy: his premature and violent death might therefore be a rebuke for his rashness, but it was chiefly a judgment upon a hypocritical and wicked generation. Whatever sin Josiah committed, he doubtless repented of it: and the final state of one who habitually lives a life of repentance, faith, and obedience, cannot be affected, by the manner in which he is suddenly taken away. The second chariot seems to have been one that waited for him in case of necessity: into which he was removed from that which was perhaps covered with blood.

V. 25—27. Though the people would not imitate Josiah’s eminent piety, and though they disliked his reformation; yet they respected his character, and were sensible, that they had sustained a very great loss. The book of the Lamentations of Jeremiah was written on another occasion: and what he composed upon the death of Josiah hath not come down to us. But both the prophet and the people, took several methods of doing honour to the memory of their prince; and of perpetuating the lamentations made on the account of his death.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—19.

Much good may be done by persons in authority, who spare no labour and no expense, in promoting the honour of God; and who unite their own example and influence with their most zealous endeavours, to excite and encourage other members of the community to do their duty. Even they that teach others, and are holy to the Lord, not only by office, but in their hearts and lives, need to be repeatedly exhorted and charged to serve God and his church, with increasing zeal and persevering diligence; and when one service is finished, to proceed with alacrity to another.—God alone can efficaciously sanctify and prepare our hearts for his holy service; but there is a duty belonging to us respecting ourselves and our brethren, in the performance of which we obtain this blessing, and become instrumental to each other’s benefit: and ministers should always begin to sanctify themselves, before they attempt to prepare the people for the ordinances of God. In due attendance on these, revivals of religion are both manifested and forwarded; they at once honour the Lord, and become means of grace to the souls of men. The maintenance of them, in an orderly and public manner, must always be attended with expense; and the multitude of the poor will often be unable to defray it. On this account religion will, in some places and at some times, be neglected, to the discouragement of many, and the ruin of far more: it then becomes a noble generosity for kings, princes, and wealthy persons, to step forward and to communicate liberally to the assistance of the poor, that they may not want the Bread of life for their souls: and God will honour those who thus honour him. None are more bound to liberality in such cases, than the superior clergy, who enjoy large revenues appropriated to the maintenance of religion: for surely they ought willingly to assist their poorer brethren, who commonly do a large proportion of the work, without even a decent provision for themselves and their families! Thus the service of God might be prepared, and his ordinances conducted in harmony and to edification; whilst mutual love would be cemented, discouragements and temptations to envy, discontent, and revilings, would be obviated; and the affluent might expect to enjoy their abundance in reputation, beloved by their inferiors, with the blessing of God, and to his glory: whilst the whole would cause numbers to pray for each other, and to abound in many thanksgivings to God: (2 Cor. ix. 6—15.)—They that are continually so taken up in the work of God and his church, that they cannot attend to their secular interests, ought particularly to be cared for by their brethren who have more leisure: in all things we need reciprocal assistance; and they who are much employed in public exercises of religion, should be cautioned not to neglect their own souls. Alas! how are God’s ordinances disregarded, or formally attended on! The church in its best days hath fallen short hitherto of what it ought to be at all times: our most religious hours, in public or private, need forgiveness; and the mercy of God, through the Saviour’s atonement, must continue our only plea, unto the close of our days. Vast exertions are requisite to produce an outward attendance on religion: but the efficacious grace of God alone can convert the heart. Except our dependence be fixed on it, the most excellent means and instruments will be ineffectual, and serve only to demonstrate the strength of man’s depravity, and the justice of God in the sinner’s condemnation: and abused mercies will after a time be withdrawn.

to punish the wickedness of the community: and even their own indiscretions, contrary to their general character, and of fatal consequence, may be permitted as a national judgment. We are not bound to believe all those who profess to speak by the authority of God: but it is always right to act with caution, to search the Scriptures, to seek the Lord's direction in prayer, and to consult wise, experienced, and pious friends; that we may discover as far as possible what is the truth and will of God concerning us, and that we may not be found to fight against him. Men seldom prosper in those measures which are unadvisedly adopted: and they who are honoured with great usefulness, should be doubly circumspect in their conduct, and careful of their lives, because so many are interested in them. However, believers, even when taken away by a sudden or premature death, are removed to a better world: and their survivors should honour them, notwithstanding their imperfections; and will frequently perceive they have great cause to mourn for them. Yet, many join in lamenting the death and commemorating the goodness of useful men, who neither regard their admonitions, nor imitate their examples. And many mourn over their own calamities, who do not repent, and forsake those sins which have provoked God to inflict them: yet this alone can avert still more tremendous judgments.

be expected to come in like a flood, and to bear down all before them. Indeed Providence often raises up such worthless rulers, one after another, to scourge a guilty land; and then every change proves a step towards more complete destruction. Infatuated counsels and treacherous measures concur in bringing ruin upon those, who, in proud contempt of God, reject the warnings of his ministers, from his word; and who thus "stiffen their neck, and harden their heart from turning unto the Lord." Yet he would not punish whole kingdoms for the impiety of their rulers, did not the people also transgress very much: but when nations, favoured with his word and ordinances, become so corrupt, that nobles, priests, and people imitate, and even exceed, the abominations of the heathen; and add the shameless profanation of things most sacred, and the most obstinate contempt of his holy word, to all their other crimes, what can be expected but miseries as remarkable as their wickedness? And when the mockery and persecution of his ministers is added to all the rest, the "wrath of the Lord will arise against such a people, till there be no remedy." He indeed delighteth in mercy, and is honoured by the repentance and salvation of sinners. The whole plan of redemption; the warnings, invitations, and entreaties of his word, and his long-suffering towards us, prove his rich compassion and love: but these endearing attributes are exercised in exact consistency with his justice, holiness, and truth, and according to the counsel of his infallible wisdom; and when no means, mercies, or warnings are effectual to bring sinners to repentance, there is no remedy, but he must vindicate the honour of his despised authority, patience, and mercy, in their condign punishment. Nothing, except obstinate impenitent unbelief and iniquity, can ruin our souls; but nothing can save those who persist in rejecting the salvation of the Gospel: for the honour of the truths and ordinances of God demands the destruction of men who disgrace, whilst they pretend to glory in them. Yet ministers must not yield to despondency or resentment, however disappointed, mocked, or misused: they must copy the patience and forbearance of the Lord; and spare no pains, and leave no proper method untried, to bring sinners to repentance.

V. 17—23.

The instruments of divine vengeance against devoted nations are of themselves disposed for their bloody work; and the Lord arms them with power, and gives up the objects of his righteous indignation into their hands. Then, no age or sex, no sacredness of place or character, will move compassion; but all will be involved in one common calamity: and the abused privileges, in which hypocritical professors confide, will both add to their guilt, and enhance the poignancy of their sufferings. Yet, all the miseries of this life are temporal; but the punishment of the wicked in another world is eternal. Even the circumstances of severe calamities often forebode and make way for their removal. When the executioners of vengeance have cut off the more desperate transgressors, and the rest are humbled by their sufferings, and for their sins; the Lord stirs up the spirit of some instrument of his mercy, who will patronize the afflicted, and become their deliverer: and the gates of hell shall never prevail against his church.

E Z R A.

IT is generally agreed that Ezra wrote this book, and also the preceding books of Chronicles. It is likewise recorded by the Jewish writers, that he revised all the preceding parts of Scripture, and published a correct copy of the whole: and indeed this account appears highly probable. He is not called a prophet in the sacred Scripture: yet there can be no doubt but he performed these services under the guidance of the holy Spirit; as no distinction is made in the New Testament between one part and another of that volume, which was then called "The Oracles of God," and as such sanctioned by our Lord and his apostles. The prophecies of Haggai and Zechariah confirm the history contained in the former part of this book: and as Ezra alone records the re-building of the temple, whatever in the New Testament relates to the temple, as then standing, is in some sense a sanction to the authenticity of the narrative: though I do not recollect any express references to it except in the genealogies. Neither does the book appear to contain any direct prophecies; but it is written in so pious a strain, and so much in the manner of the other Scriptures, that it has strong internal evidences of divine inspiration. As express mention is made in it of Jeremiah's prophecies, and plain intimations are given of Isaiah's extraordinary predictions concerning Cyrus, (i. 1—3.) it is evident the writings of these prophets were then extant: and the constant reference to the law of Moses and the preceding histories in this book, and that of Nehemiah, proves the same respecting them.—Ezra was peculiarly had in honour by the ancient Jews, and is so by the modern: and to this we must ascribe the forgery of several other books under his name, (especially the two apocryphal books of Esdras or Ezra:) for forgeries they undoubtedly are. This history opens with the proclamation of Cyrus, the return of a company of Jews, and their attempts to rebuild the city and temple, and to re-inhabit the land; it proceeds to record the opposition they met with, the delays this occasioned, and how, after a time, they in part succeeded. At length, about seventy-eight or nine years afterwards, (concerning a large part of which nothing is recorded,) Ezra himself arrived with a commission, and large powers and grants from Artaxerxes, and with many attendants: and the narrative closes with an account of the sin of the Jews in marrying heathen wives; Ezra's grief, humble confession, and prayers on that account; and his pious endeavours to separate his people from idolaters.—In this and the subsequent history, the Jews no longer appear as an independent prosperous nation, governed by kings of their own race; but a small remnant returned from captivity, by the favour of the Persian kings, and under their protection and dominion; and struggling, often feebly, with many difficulties and enemies; yet, in this condition, they were enabled to re-establish the worship of God at the temple in Jerusalem; to which they outwardly adhered till the coming of Christ; being effectually cured of idolatry, though in other respects exceedingly prone to disobedience.—During the captivity, nothing is recorded of their history, except what may be collected from the prophecies of Ezekiel and Daniel: and exceedingly little is contained in the Scripture of their condition during 536 years, till the birth of Christ, compared with the regular history given of the nation from the days of Moses to the captivity. The old dispensation was about to expire and make way for Christianity; the Spirit of prophecy was about to be withdrawn for a season; and the people had so often and so flagrantly violated their national covenant, that they were not honoured and noticed as they had been in former ages.

NOTES.

CHAP. I. V. 1—4. Nebuchadnezzar reigned, after the first captivity of the Jews in the fourth year of Jehoiakim, forty-five years. His son Evil-merodach was slain by Neriglissar, his brother-in-law, after he had reigned two years; and probably Jehoiachin died before him. After four years Neriglissar was slain in battle by Cyrus: in a few months Belshazzar, the son of Evil-merodach, mounted the throne: and at the end of seventeen years he was slain in Babylon by Cyrus; (Dan. v.) Then Cyaxares, or Darius the Mede, the uncle and father-in-law of Cyrus, succeeded to the throne of all these kingdoms; and after two years he died, and left the whole of them to Cyrus, who, in the first year after his predecessor's death, proclaimed liberty to the captive Jews. This is the first computation of the seventy years of the Babylonish captivity. As Daniel prospered in the reign of Darius the Mede and of Cyrus the Persian, there can be little doubt, but that he was instrumental in procuring the Jews this extraordinary proclamation: and probably he showed that prince the prophecy of Isaiah, which was known to have been long extant, and in which he was predicted by name, and his successors were described, and by which he was appointed to rebuild Jerusalem and the temple; and also those of Jeremiah, which foretold the exact duration of the captivity. (Marg. Ref.) These predictions, set before him by a person of Daniel's reputation for wisdom and eminent station, seem to have produced in the mind of this prudent and humane conqueror, a conviction that the God of Israel was the true God, and that the captive Jews were his chosen people and Jerusalem the place where he was especially pleased to be worshipped. Thus "the LORD stirred up his spirit" to issue a proclamation, which was publicly made known in every place by heralds appointed for that service, and also committed to writing, that the Jews were at liberty, and should be protected, in returning to Jerusalem and rebuilding the temple. In this proclamation Cyrus called the God of Israel, "JEHOVAH, the God of Heaven," and avowed, "that he was THE GOD," in contradistinction to all others that were so called. He acknowledged, that he had received his dominions from him, whether acquired by inheritance or conquest. These, being far superior to any other empire then in the world; (as comprising the dominions of the Medes and Persians increased by those of the Assyrians, Babylonians, and others,) were called in the customary style, "All the kingdoms of the earth." And he declared that "the LORD had charged him to build him an house at Jerusalem." Some think that this was done in a vision vouchsafed to him; but probably it was his inference from Isaiah's prophecies. He also wished the Jews success in the name of the Lord, and in some sense prayed for his powerful and favourable presence with them. And he exhorted others, in every place, to help those who went upon this undertaking, with such things as were needful for their expenses, and for accomplishing their pious intentions. Some interpret this as an order to the rulers of the provinces, to supply them from the public revenues: others suppose that Cyrus allowed the Jews to collect voluntary contributions from his subjects at large; and some confine it to the Jews that did not go up to Jerusalem, who were exhorted to assist their brethren that did. Without such assistance, many, that "remained in any place," waiting an opportunity of going up to Jerusalem, would have been eventually hindered. Besides affording assistance to the Jews for their journey; the people in general were allowed, and even reminded, to send oblations for the temple, which was about to be built at Jerusalem. By this decree the Jews, who had been enslaved, were virtually released, provided they chose to engage in this enterprise. Any attempt of this kind would previously have been punished as rebellion; but now, the government being favourable, their opposers would be restrained, and many would readily help them on that account alone. As the kings of Persia still retained the sovereignty of the land, it could be no real impolicy to encourage the people to re-inhabit and cultivate a fertile territory, which had long lain desolate. But this measure was so contrary to their ancient prejudices and superstitions, that it was probably dictated by conscience, and a sense of duty to the God of heaven: though we find nothing in the subsequent history of this prince, to favour a conclusion that he finally renounced idolatry, and became a true worshipper of JEHOVAH. The proclamation, however, was honourable to God; and would encourage the Jews to adhere to their religion, and be more zealous for it; and perhaps induce many of the Gentiles to respect, and even to embrace it.

V. 5, 6. Some persons may perhaps wonder that, on this proclamation, the Jews did not assemble in one body, and directly go and take possession of their ancient inheritance: but a little reflection shows the matter in another light. The city and temple lay a heap of ruins, and it would cost immense labour and expense to rebuild them. The land was either wholly desolate, or occupied by encroaching neighbours; and in either case, it would require some time and trouble to procure for themselves habitations and provisions. The journey was arduous and perilous, for those who were attended with their families and substance; and many enemies would endeavour to plunder them by the way, as far as they could and dared. None of them had seen Jerusalem or the temple, except such as were above fifty years of age; at which period of life the spirit of enterprise commonly begins to decline. Few were attached to the temple by true piety: and most of them wanted even that attachment which men naturally feel for the land of their nativity; having been born in the places where they were now settled. Some persons of true and eminent piety were so situated, that they did not think it their duty to remove; as Daniel in the court of Cyrus: others would be hindered by the infirmities of old age, and the peculiar circumstances of their families and connexions. In short, the difficulties, hardship, and peril were manifest; the success of the attempt would be doubtful to all but those that were strong in faith: its temporal advantages were remote and precarious, and not worth the venture, especially to such as had obtained comfortable settlements or occupations, in the land of their captivity: even the spiritual advantages would appear to the godly mind, more intended for posterity than for that generation; and to engage in it, in this view, would require vigorous faith, lively hope, and an active zeal for the honour of God, and the benefit of his church, and establishment of his worship in ages to come. We may conclude, that in consequence of the captivities, many Israelites, and some of the Jews, were finally incorporated with the heathen, among whom they dwelt; yet these calamities seem to have had a very good effect on considerable numbers. The chief fathers of Judah and Benjamin, who had the greatest influence in their tribes, first moved in this undertaking; and they were joined by the leading men among the priests and Levites, which doubtless rendered the design more reputable: and thus a considerable number were encouraged to attend them: whilst others assisted, and sent oblations for the intended temple. Many more returned than we read of being carried away captive: but as the land had been utterly desolated, all the surviving inhabitants must have been driven into other countries, and most of them into those lands which had been subject to the kings of Babylon, and were now fallen under the dominion of the kings of Persia: and doubtless many of the ten tribes accompanied the Jews at this time. It is, however, evident that a great majority, even of the latter, chose to continue in the settlements that they had there gained: some of them afterwards returned, but more never did; and immense numbers of Jews were from that time dispersed, in every city and country over all that part of the world. So that the new settlement, in Judea and at Jerusalem, formed but a small part of that people, as they continued to be distinguished from other nations; for they still increased and multiplied very rapidly, according to the promise of God to their fathers. It is worthy of observation, that no Jews, who chose to go, were excluded by Cyrus's proclamation: yet the language of the sacred historian implies, that none would actually have gone, if He who "stirred up the spirit of Cyrus," had not also "stirred up the spirit of the people," to avail themselves of this permission: (the original words are the same in both clauses.) This transaction, (as Archbishop Usher has particularly observed,) furnishes a most striking illustration, or, as I would rather say, representation, of the way in which the Gospel is proposed to sinners, and embraced by believers. It is in general set before the ruined descendants of Adam: with the Saviour's most solemn assurance, that "Him who cometh—he will in no wise cast out." Yet "no man can come unto him, except the Father draw him." On one pretence or other, all who are left to themselves, "neglect so great salvation," and are justly condemned. But God, by his preventing grace, "moves the spirits" of some, who thus thankfully embrace the proffered blessing, and are mercifully saved.

V. 7—11. Some of the vessels of the temple had been cut in pieces by the victors; (Marg. Ref.) but the most valuable had been providentially preserved through all the succeeding revolutions, and were now ordered by Cyrus to be restored to Sheshbazzar; and so were at last brought back to Jerusalem, and again employed in the service of the sanctuary. It is generally agreed, that the ark was lost or destroyed when the temple was burnt: and, it is likely, that by the absence of it, and his visible glory, 'God would Patrick.)—The knives were used for slaying and preparing the sacrifices, and the vessels for receiving the blood, for the meat-offerings, and other similar purposes. The sum total of the vessels here stated far exceeds the particular account given of them : but it is supposed, that many spoons, tongs, &c. not before numbered, were included. Sheshbazzar may signify joy in tribulation : and it is supposed that this name was given, by the kings of Babylon, to the same person whom the Jews called Zerubbabel, which signifies a stranger at Babylon. He was the grandson of Jehoiachin by Salathiel, and the heir of the house of David : as such he was regarded by the conquerors ; he possessed authority over the captive Jews ; and he was authorized, and willingly undertook, to lead those back who now returned to rebuild the city and temple. (Marg. Ref.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

As the architect progressively executes every part of the plan which he had delineated, till the whole design is completed ; so God in his providence performs in due order all the prophecies of his word : much of his great scheme hath already been accomplished, and revolving ages will hasten the performance of all the rest in the appointed periods. Difficulties, that to us appear impossibilities, form no obstruction to Omnipotence. The Lord our God turneth the hearts of kings, as he doth the rivers of waters, which way he pleases : he subverts the deep laid foundations of mighty empires, and establishes others in their room : he throws away the executioners of his vengeance, when their work is done, to make way for the instruments of his mercy : he gives, as he pleases, abilities, success, and authority ; and then secretly disposes men’s minds to fulfil his word and do his will, and over-rules every thing for the good of his church, and of those who trust in him. When he has work to do, they whom he hath chosen to perform it find their minds enlarged to entertain noble designs ; and, forgetful of their former habits, maxims, and superstitions, they serve his cause with all the authority which he hath conferred on them. Even they who live and die strangers to the power of true religion, have often received deep convictions of his eternal power and Godhead, and of their obligations and accountableness to the God of heaven : and under these convictions, they have made public and honourable confessions to him, have shown for a time a regard for his authority, and have done many and great things for his cause and people ; speaking the language of piety, and being very useful to his worshippers : and yet at last they have relapsed into their former idolatry or ungodliness !—If such things have heretofore been done in fulfilling former prophecies ; the Lord is equally able and faithful to provide for the ruin of Anti-christ, the conversion of the Jews, and the calling of all the Gentiles into his church. In every useful undertaking, all should endeavour to be helpful ; and it bodes well, when princes and ministers take the lead and give the example, in arduous and self-denying services. Some may be useful by their labours, some with their substance, and all by their prayers, to the common cause of truth and righteousness : and whatever is done willingly, and from love to God and his people, will be graciously accepted. No time should be lost in setting about those duties which belong to us in our several stations : and in stirring up others to abound in love and good works, we should give them an example. That which is devoted to the service, is intrusted to the protection, of the Lord : and he will especially keep account of and preserve those whom he hath “ purified unto himself to be a peculiar “ people, zealous of good works.” Even the very hairs of their head are all numbered ; and whatever tribulations they may pass through, no true believer shall perish, but they shall all be forth-coming, at that day “ when the Lord “ shall make up his jewels.”—Salvation is fully prepared in Jesus Christ ; “ all power in heaven and earth is given “ unto him :” the proclamation of the Gospel is general to every creature. But pride, worldly lusts, and unbelief, render us averse to the gracious proposal : and it would be made in vain, did not the Lord raise up the spirits of a remnant, “ according to the election of grace,” to renounce all for the sake of Christ and his salvation. They who prefer carnal things, to the eternal blessings which he confers, will find, that their pride and love of sin will aggravate, and not excuse, the guilt of their unbelief. They that feel a willingness to accept of what they have heretofore neglected, may come with encouragement, for Jesus will in no wise cast them out. And if we by grace have been enabled to receive this salvation, and to bring forth the fruits of it : whilst we take the comfort of it, we shall give him the glory, and offer our fervent prayers, that others also may be made willing in the day of his power.

NOTES.

CHAP. II. V. 1. Province, &c. This term seems to denote Judea, as now become a province of the Persian empire.

V. 2. Nehemiah, &c. These were the chief fathers, who were next in authority, and assistant, to Zerubbabel in this expedition. Jeshua, or Joshua, was the high-priest, the grandson of Seraiah, who was slain by Nebuchadnezzar. (2 Kings xxv. 18.) Nehemiah and Mordecai were not the same persons that we afterwards read of, who bore these names; for they flourished many years later. (Neh. i. 1. Esth. iii. 2.) As these persons renounced many advantages, and encountered many hardships and dangers, in attempting to rebuild the temple and city, and resume possession of the promised land; it was proper that their names should be recorded, as a mark of honourable distinction to them and their descendants.

V. 3—29. The Register, in the book of Nehemiah, answers to this here given in so many particulars, that there can be no doubt but the same is meant in both places. In general, the names and the numbers of each family, are nearly the same; and the sum total is computed in both exactly alike. Yet there are several considerable variations, in names and numbers, which cannot be readily and satisfactorily accounted for. The most material of these are marked in the margin. It is probable, that Ezra, when he wrote his history, many years after the return of the Jews to Babylon, copied this register from the public records without alteration. Some think, that several who had their names inserted in the register, altered their minds, or died before the company arrived at Jerusalem; and that others came forward, so as to complete the same number in all. (Notes, Neh. vii.) The word children is sometimes used for the descendants from the several heads of families; at others for those, whose ancestors belonged to the cities mentioned in connexion with them.

V. 36—39. A very large number of priests went up to Jerusalem on this occasion: yet only four, out of the twenty-four courses instituted by David, seem to have returned: at least only four of the persons, after whom the courses were first named, are here mentioned; namely, Jedaiah, Immer, Harim, and Pashur, who was the son of Malchijah, (1 Chr. ix. 12. xxiv. 7—9. 14:) and his name appears to have stood in the public records, as head of his course, instead of his father's. The priests, however, were afterwards divided into twenty-four courses, under the ancient names, in order to preserve regularity in their ministrations.

V. 40—42. The small number of Levites, when compared with the multitude of priests, who returned from Babylon, is very remarkable. Perhaps during a course of years, having no employment in their appropriate services, they generally entered on other occupations; and felt little inducement or inclination to leave them, in order to be the assistants of the priests, in the present desolated condition of Judah and Jerusalem. Whereas it may be supposed, that the priests, having a more sacred and honourable office, were reluctant to be deprived of it, and more ready to resume the exercise of their ministry.

V. 43. (Note, 1 Chr. ix. 2.)

V. 55. These were persons descended from the remains of the devoted Canaanites who had been brought into bondage by Solomon; and so their posterity were employed in menial services, perhaps about the sanctuary, along with the Nethinims: and though both the Nethinims and "the children of Solomon's servants" were of Gentile extraction, and not admitted to the privileges of Israelites; yet they seem to have been more ready to return to Jerusalem, than the Levites were.

V. 61-63. Either Habaiah, or Koz, being of the sacerdotal family, married one of Barzillai's daughters; and his posterity perhaps thought their descent from him more honourable than their priestly character, and so neglected to preserve their genealogy. Yet on their return from captivity, they desired to be admitted to the service of the sanctuary: but not being able to trace their genealogy, they were excluded by the Tirshatha, (that is, the governor, or Zerub-babel;) until a high-priest should arise with Urim and Thummim, who might, by immediate revelation from God, decide upon their case. (Marg. Ref.) But such a high-priest was not vouchsafed under the second temple, until the coming of Christ.

V. 64. The number of the several families amount only to twenty-nine thousand eight hundred and eighteen; and those in Nehemiah to thirty-one thousand and eighty-nine: yet the sum total is in both said to be forty-two thousand three hundred and sixty, besides their servants. The surplus are supposed to have been Levites who could not produce their genealogy, and Israelites from the other tribes, who accompanied their brethren of Judah and Benjamin. 'It is remarkable that the two accounts' (of Ezra and Nehemiah) 'agree in the total amount; and the sum of the numbers, as separately detailed, will correspond; if to the 29,318, specified by Ezra, we add the 1765 persons reckoned by Nehemiah, which Ezra has omitted: and on the other hand, to the 31,089 enumerated by Nehemiah, add the 494, which is an overplus in Ezra, not noticed by Nehemiah: both writers including in the sum total 10,777 of the mixed multitude, not particularized in the individual detail.'—'Prideaux attributes the difference to alterations made by Nehemiah, in compliance with changes, that had happened since the departure from Babylon.' 'The accounts unquestionably agreed, when they were received into the canon, except where there might be some cause for variation; and probably the 'differences that now exist have originated in the carelessness of the copyists.' (Gray's Key.)

V. 65. Among the servants were two hundred singing men and women, (or two hundred and forty-five, according to Nehemiah) who probably were employed in families, to assist their mournings, or their thanksgivings. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 66, 67. How reduced and impoverished does Israel appear in this narrative, compared with the condition of the nation in the days of David and Solomon!

V. 68-70. Under the divine protection this company arrived safe at Jerusalem, without any memorable occurrence. They found the city and all around in ruins, and it seems the neighbouring cities totally unoccupied. These they rebuilt as well as they could, and dwelt in them for the present. But the house of God was uppermost in their thoughts; and it seems that their oblations to it were made, before they separated to seek habitations or subsistence. The whole amounted to nearly eighty thousand pounds sterling, besides the priest's garments; which was a considerable sum for them to contribute in their present poverty: but probably their brethren that staid behind, offered part of it: as the sacrifices and the burning of incense at the temple, were for the benefit of those who worshipped at, or towards, that typical residence of the God of Israel.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The Lord will honour those who renounce their own ease or interest for the sake of his service and glory: and all who avail themselves of the proclamation of liberty and salvation sent in the Gospel, have their names recorded in the book of life; whilst others shall be written in the dust of oblivion or disgrace. Those orders of men that have on one occasion been most zealous in the cause of God, may at another time become most negligent; and the reverse is often exemplified; “for the first shall be last, and the last first:” (36—42. 2 Chron. xxix. 34.)—They that are ashamed of religion, or undervalue their external relation to God, in times of reproach, persecution, or distress, will have no benefit from it when it becomes honourable or profitable; and they who have no evidence that they are, by regeneration, spiritual priests unto God through Jesus Christ, have no right to the peculiar comforts and privileges of Christians. But there are many cases of which we cannot judge, but must leave them to be determined at the second coming of our High-Priest, whose illuminations and perfections are unchangeable and eternal.—They that seek first the kingdom of God, his favour, and his glory, will have all things else added to them: they will readily offer according to their ability for the house and service of God: and “where there is a willing mind it is accepted, according to what a man hath, and not according to what he hath not.”—Sin always impoverishes and degrades both individuals and societies; but sometimes that poverty and degradation are sanctified, and finally promote their true interest and honour. Our gracious Lord will carry us through those undertakings, which are entered on according to his will, with an aim to his glory, and in dependence on his assistance: and then we shall be made superior to all difficulties, hardships, and dangers. Thus they who, at the call of the Gospel, renounce sin, and return unto the Lord, shall be guarded and guided through all the perils of the way; and arrive safe at those mansions which are prepared for them in the holy city of our God.

NOTES.

CHAP. III. V. 1. We may suppose that the Jews began their journey in the beginning of the spring; and probably they did not reach Jerusalem till three or four months after. (vii. 9.) They took a short time to provide habitations and necessaries for their families; and then all met together in the seventh month. This was the season of the first solemnities which occurred after their arrival. On the first day the feast of trumpets was kept; the great day of atonement followed on the tenth; and the feast of tabernacles began on the fifteenth. All these they seem to have observed with great devotion. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 3. The Jews built the altar upon the same foundation, and therefore of the same size, with that of Solomon. Probably it was formed of rough stones, with a large hearth of brass on the top. (Exod. xx. 25.) So large an altar, built all of brass, would have cost a sum far beyond their present circumstances. The fear of the tribes or nations around them, whom they knew to be their enemies, did not cause the people to take arms, or to erect fortifications, but to prepare an altar and to offer sacrifices; by which they put themselves under the protection of the Lord.

V. 4. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 6. From, &c. Many of the people had come to Jerusalem, and had got the altar ready before the first day of the seventh month. And the rest being assembled as one man, they then began their solemn worship with the daily sacrifices, those appointed for the new moons, and those for the feast of trumpets. The sacrifices for all these solemnities, till the conclusion of the feast of tabernacles, must have been a heavy expense for so poor a company: yet beside those which were expressly appointed, many “willingly offered free-will-offerings unto the Lord.”—Until the temple was completed, it is likely they had a tabernacle near the altar, where the sacred vessels and treasures were deposited and attended. (1 Chron. ix. 19.)

Zidon, and to them of Tyre, to bring cedar-trees from Lebanon to the sea of Joppa, ^a according to the grant that they had of Cyrus king of Persia.

8 ¶ Now in the second year of their coming unto the house of God at Jerusalem, in the second month, began ^r Zerubbabel the son of Shealtiel, and Jeshua the son of Jozadak, and the remnant of their brethren the priests and the Levites, and all they that were come out of the captivity unto Jerusalem; and appointed the Levites, from ^s twenty years old and upward, to set forward the work of the house of the LORD.

9 Then stood Jeshua with his sons and his brethren, Kadmiel and his sons, the sons of ^t Judah, ^{*} together, to set forward the workmen in the house of God: the sons of Henadad, with their sons and their brethren the Levites.

10 And when the builders laid the foundation of the temple of the LORD, they ^u set the priests in their apparel

11 And ^a they sang together by course in praising and giving thanks unto the LORD; ^b Because he is good, for his mercy endureth for ever towards Israel. And all the people ^c shouted with a great shout when they praised the LORD, ^d because the foundation of the house of the LORD was laid.

V. 7. The Jews were authorized by Cyrus to cut as much timber in Lebanon, as they wanted; but the Zidonians and Tyrians would expect to be paid for their labour; and they would prefer corn, wine, and oil, to money. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 8-11. The people did all that they could, during the winter, in making preparations for building the temple; though immense labour must have been requisite to clear the ground for the foundation, as well as in providing materials. So that in the second month of the second year, or in a little more than a year after they left Babylon, Zerubbabel and Jeshua, having appointed the priests and Levites to attend in their courses, laid the foundation of the temple, with songs of praise and thanksgiving to the Lord. Thus after their long afflictions, they were encouraged again to sing, "The LORD is good, for his mercy endureth for ever towards Israel;" as the prophet Jeremiah had foretold. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 12, 13. The Jews who had heard of the temple and its solemn worship, and the blessing and comfort which it had been to their fathers, but had not seen it, were elated with joy that they were once more to have a temple, as the symbol of the Lord's presence, and his favour to them. On the other hand, the old men, who remembered the splendour of the former temple, (which had now been destroyed about fifty-three years,) were led by the recollection of past prosperity, to vent their regret in copious tears and loud lamentations. By this they undervalued their present mercies: and it was the more reprehensible, as the priests and Levites, and chief persons, led the way in this unseasonable sorrow, so as to discourage their brethren, and interrupt their fervent praises. The temple itself is supposed to have been rebuilt of the same dimensions as before; but probably it was formed chiefly with the old stones, and with inferior workmanship; and it was not overlaid with gold, as Solomon's temple had been: neither was it, for a long time at least, surrounded with such magnificent out-buildings. Moreover, the ark of the covenant, the tables of the law, and the mercy-seat, were irrecoverably lost; and it is uncertain whether any thing was substituted in their stead: no visible glory, it is said, now appeared in the most holy place; there were no answers by Urim and Thummim; and no fire from Heaven to consume the sacrifices, but common fire was used for that purpose. These and other circumstances seemed to indicate, that the Lord was not with them as in times past: but they really showed, that the types were waxing old and ready to vanish away, by the coming of the great Antitype.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

It is true wisdom to prefer the service of God to our most urgent temporal concerns. The greater difficulties, and the more formidable enemies, we are exposed to, the more we need the friendship and assistance of God; and we should be proportionably earnest and constant in seeking and serving him according to his word through the great atonement of our heavenly Advocate. They that rule over others should go before them in every good work: and we should serve the Lord, as well as our circumstances will permit, though we cannot attain to all that is desirable. That which is expended in obedience to his commandment, will never impoverish us or our families: we should therefore rather save in any thing, than grudge the expense of works of piety and charity, which is like sowing the seed of a future harvest.—Every day brings its peculiar duties: these will not be grievous, but pleasant to the true servant of the Lord; and when zeal and love prevail, he will be looking out for opportunities of usefulness, and cheerfully bringing his free-will-offerings.—Unanimity, activity, and promptitude, in contriving and executing good designs, will surmount many difficulties, and perform great things in a little time; especially if all orders in society concur in their proper places.—The trumpet of the Gospel not only warns the sinner to flee from the wrath to come, but animates the believer to his work.—Every recent token of the loving-kindness of the Lord should remind us to celebrate his former goodness and mercy, and to anticipate future blessings; for, notwithstanding our chastisements and distrustful murmurs, “the LORD is good and his mercy endureth for ever towards Israel.” The conviction of this truth, and the consideration of our own unworthiness, should enlarge our hearts with hope and gratitude at every renewed token of his favour; and render us joyful at our work, and even amidst our trials. But we are too prone to bemoan lost comforts, disappointments, and scanty possessions; to foster discontent, impatience, and distrust, and thus to mar our own enjoyment of present mercies, to interrupt the joy of others, and to refuse our God that praise which is due unto his name. Against this propensity we should continually watch and pray. Even when we compare the present low state of true piety and the small success of the Gospel, with those primitive times when “great grace was upon all” the company of believers, and “the Lord daily added to the church such as should be saved;” or when we lament declensions in congregations, churches, or nations; we should be careful not to undervalue the present goodness of our God, to despise the day of small things; or to weaken our own hands, and discourage the hearts of others, in seeking a more signal and effectual blessing.—In this world joys and sorrows will be blended, for it is a mixed state: hereafter there will be a complete separation; in one place there will be fulness of joy and pleasures for evermore, in the other there will be eternal weeping, wailing, and gnashing of teeth. May “Jesus deliver us from the wrath to come,” and prepare us for his glorious and eternal felicity; that where he is there we may be also.”

NOTES.

CHAP. IV. V. 1. The Cutheans, or Samaritans, who had been planted in the land of Israel by Esar-haddon, had perhaps encroached upon the countries belonging to the Jews; and doubtless they were envious of the favour shown them by the King of Persia: and thus they took occasion to become their determined enemies. But they were chiefly influenced by the enmity which the seed of the serpent bears to the true church of God; arising from contrariety of character, and hatred to the holiness of God, as displayed in his holy law, ordinances, truths, and people. But they might also fear, lest the establishment of the true worship of Jehovah would expose their mongrel religion to disgrace.

V. 2. We seek, &c. The Samaritans professed to worship the God of Israel: yet they were not guided by his word, but by their own fancies or traditions, in the service which they professed to render to him; and they worshipped with him their tutelar deities: so that their religion was a jumble of idolatry, superstition, and ignorance; far worse than it was when our Lord himself declared, “that they knew not what they worshipped.”

V. 3. These Samaritans were neither Israelites by birth, nor yet true proselytes: so that the law of God forbade all coalition with them, neither were they included in the decree of Cyrus. Doubtless the rulers of the Jews perceived, that the Samaritans only meant to insinuate themselves, that they might obtain pre-eminence, foment dissensions, introduce their corruptions, prejudice the minds of the people against their rulers, and in short to seize the temple, when built, for their own use; or to retard, spoil, and put a stop to the work.—It was, however, plain, that they did not mean to unite cordially with them in the worship of the true God alone according to his written word; and therefore nothing but mischief could have resulted from so unnatural an alliance among those that did.

V. 4—6. This opposition of the Samaritans is supposed to have begun soon after the foundation of the temple was laid. During the remainder of the reign of Cyrus for almost five years, however, they did not attempt any thing openly against a work which that prince had commanded: but they discouraged the people, and impeded their progress; and by bribing counsellors to oppose their application to the ministers of Cyrus, for supplies or protection, they greatly obstructed the design. This would be more easily done, as Daniel, the powerful friend of the Jews, seems to have died about this time. Cambyses, the son of Cyrus, called here (as it is probably supposed) Ahasuerus, reigned above seven years; and was a very weak and vicious prince: but regard to his father's memory, it is probable, prevented his noticing the clamours of the Samaritans against the Jews. Yet for want of assistance and protection, they made little progress during his reign.

V. 7—9. Upon the death of Cambyses, Smerdis the Magian usurped the throne, and as he alone reigned in Persia, after Cambyses and before Darius Hystaspis, under whom the temple was finished, he must be the Artaxerxes here mentioned. The rulers of the Samaritans wrote a letter to him, which Ezra seems to have copied from the records of Persia. It was written at first in Syriac or Chaldee; but perhaps it was entered into the records in Persian; so that

Vol. II.—No. 12.

Ezra, when he extracted it, again translated it into Syriac; and therefore it stands in the original scriptures in that language, as does all that follows to the end of the sixth chapter. Bishlam, Mithredath, and Tabeel, seem to have been the principal persons who counselled their people to send this letter; and Rehum and Shimshai, it is probable, drew it up.

V. 10. Asnapper, &c. Probably Asnapper was the name by which Esar-haddon was known, in the eastern parts of the Assyrian empire.

At such a time. The date of the letter seems to have followed in the records; but it was omitted by the transcriber, as it were, with an et cetera.

V. 12. The rebellious, &c. After God in his righteousness had reduced Judah to subjection under the kings of Babylon, the Jews certainly showed a very obstinate and treacherous spirit of rebellion; they created their new masters a great deal of trouble, and they provoked them to their own destruction. But in so doing they transgressed the commandments of their law, by violating their own solemn oaths and engagements. Nothing effectually seems at this time to have been done towards rebuilding the walls of Jerusalem; and the Samaritans were not in reality so much displeased at any thing, as the Jews building of the temple, though they artfully avoided the mention of it.

17 ¶ Then sent the king an answer unto Rehum the chancellor, and to Shimshai the scribe, and to the rest of their * companions that dwell in Samaria, and unto the rest beyond the river, Peace, and [†] at such a time.

18 The letter which ye sent unto us hath been plainly read before me.

19 And [†] I commanded, and [‡] search hath been made, and it is found that this city of old time hath [‡] made insurrection against kings, and that rebellion and sedition have been made therein.

20 [‡] There have been mighty kings also over Jerusalem, which have ruled over all countries [‡] beyond the river; and toll, tribute, and custom, was paid unto them.

21 ¶ Give ye now commandment to cause these men to cease, and that this city be not builded, until another commandment shall be given from me.

22 Take heed now that ye fail not to do this: [‡] why should damage grow to the hurt of the kings?

23 ¶ Now when the copy of king Artaxerxes' letter was read before Rehum, and Shimshai the scribe, and their companions, [‡] they went up in haste to Jerusalem unto the Jews, and made them to cease by [‡] force and power.

24 Then ceased the work of the house of God, which is at Jerusalem. [‡] So it ceased unto the second year of the reign of [‡] Darius king of Persia.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—6.

Every vigorous and successful attempt to revive true religion will excite the opposition of Satan, and of the children of disobedience in whom he worketh. Indeed all ungodly men despise or hate holiness: yet they who do not pretend to religion, commonly treat pious persons with mere neglect or ridicule; but hypocrites and heretics have always been the most unwearied and cruel enemies of the true church of God. The labours and lives of his servants undermine their reputation, affront their pride, and expose their hypocrisy: and their enmity is thus embittered by envy and resentment. Sometimes indeed they seem desirous of being admitted to the fellowship of believers, and profess to be of the same sentiments, and to be minding the same things. But they only want to insinuate themselves, that they may gain pre-eminence, and manage every thing for their own purposes. Such "false brethren, un-[‡]awares crept in privily, bring in damnable heresies" form parties, and excite contentions, introduce their own coalition betwixt the world and religion, mislead and prejudice some, and pervert others, lessen the influence of pious persons, and render the minds of the people disaffected towards them: and, whilst their lives disgrace the cause, their insinuations eat as doth a canker, till an internal decay corrode the very vitals of piety, in every church where they obtain admission and preserve their authority. Let then all the friends of truth and holiness beware of such characters, and let them withdraw from them: "by their fruits ye shall know them;" and let no plausible pretences, or hopes of support from their superior rank or wealth, bribe Christians to admit them "to build with them," unless they mean to build a Babel, instead of a temple. It is true, if you will not have their friendship, you must expect their embittered resentment, which is more dreaded, but is far less dangerous. By insinuations, objections, and discouragements, they weaken the hands of the Lord's people, and induce them to suspect or dislike their faithful

V. 13—16. David and Solomon had reigned over all the countries from the river Euphrates to the river of Egypt: but this was long before the commencement of the Babylonish or Persian monarchies. And after the death of Solomon, their successors had been confined within much narrower limits. The Samaritans, however, aimed to insinuate a jealousy into the mind of the king of Persia, that the Jews intended to claim and seize upon all those dominions; than which nothing could be more groundless and absurd. All their offence seems to have been, that they had prepared to defend themselves against their enemies, whilst acting under the authority of the king of Persia. The Samaritans cloaked their slander and enmity, under the fair pretence of fidelity and gratitude: the ruling persons among them were maintained by revenues from the court of Persia; it was not meet for them to see the king's dishonour; and the loss which would accrue to him, if the Jews were not prevented from going on with their work.

V. 17—24. The king of Persia found by the records that Jerusalem had been the seat of government for powerful princes many ages before; and that afterwards rebellion and sedition had been made in it: and, as thus much was true in the letter of the Samaritans, full credit was given them for all that they advanced, concerning the progress and intentions of the Jews, and the consequences of their proceeding; though nothing could be more improbable, false, and malicious! A commission therefore was sent back, in which the temple was not mentioned; (for though that created jealousy in the minds of the Samaritans, it was little regarded by the king of Persia:) but they were ordered "to cause them to cease;" this was sufficient for their purpose; and without delay they forcibly put a stop to the work. The usurpation of Smerdis did not continue a whole year; so that their commission was soon vacated: but the Jews, being greatly intimidated, and not so zealous as they had been, the work ceased till the second year of Darius, who, having assisted in killing the usurper, was advanced to the throne in his stead.

ministers, or their lawful rulers; and by slanders and reproaches, they attempt to prejudice others against them. But it is no wonder that we cannot enumerate all their practices, when they have the old Serpent for their prompter, and spare neither trouble, expense, nor crimes, to accomplish their designs. For the same part is acting over and over again, from age to age, with circumstantial variations; and the less we are aware, the more we are in danger of being injured by it.

V. 7—24.

The gates of hell, in directly assaulting the church of Christ, often labour to excite rulers to suppress his truths and ordinances, by statutes and penal sanctions. To this end ungodly men bestow great pains to obtain the ear of princes. If they find them disposed to countenance pious Christians, they use underhand methods to poison their minds with prejudices and suspicions. But when weak and wicked kings succeed to the thrones that have been filled by wiser men; these slanderers venture to speak more plainly; and, professing vast loyalty and attachment, and even pleading the ties of gratitude and conscience, they pour in their false accusations, and petition for leave to persecute. It is an old slander, that "Jerusalem is a rebellious and bad city," and that the prosperity of the church would be injurious to kings and provinces: for the accuser of the brethren knows how prevalent such considerations are with the princes of this world. Yet nothing can be more false: for, true godliness teaches us to honour and obey the king; to submit to every ordinance of man for the Lord's sake; to pay tribute, and to render unto Cæsar the things that are Cæsar's; to be upright, peaceable and blameless; and even to fulfil the oath or engagement which we have entered into to our own hurt: it admits of only a single exception; namely, where the command of God requires one thing, and the law of the land another, we must obey God rather than man, and patiently submit to the consequences. But it must be allowed, that ambitious and turbulent men have often disgraced the cause of God by their usurpations, seditions, rebellions, treacheries, and perjuries: real Christians also have been seduced into inconsistent practices: and "oppression," which "maketh a wise man mad," hath sometimes excited them to use unwarranted weapons. A few instances of this kind standing on record, whilst the blameless lives and patient sufferings of thousands are unnoticed and forgotten, serve through revolving ages as a pretext, by which malignant enmity misleads worldly policy. All who love the gospel, should therefore walk circumspectly, avoiding all appearance of evil, especially in this particular, lest the church of God and posterity should suffer through their misconduct; for the whole body will be condemned without hearing, if a few individuals act improperly. Indeed we cannot behave so quietly, and endeavour to serve God and to promote religion so unexceptionably, but our endeavours will be ascribed to ambition or avarice, and we shall be suspected of harbouring the basest intentions. For kings and princes are seldom able to discover the truth, in such causes, even when disposed to inquire after it. Surrounded with flatterers and interested dependents, they must see with other men's eyes, and receive every information, concerning those whom their courtiers dislike, with a false colouring; and as they are too generally careless about religion, if not prejudiced against it, Satan and his emissaries seldom find much difficulty in using them as the tools of their persecuting enmity. These considerations should teach us to count our cost; that we may be prepared for all events, and not be too easily discouraged or made remiss, as we are apt to be upon every appearance of opposition: they should excite our gratitude for our peculiar privileges, and teach us to place our dependence on that God who hath all hearts in his hands, and not on the mutable decrees of princes and senates. We should also be in haste to seize on every opportunity of doing good; even as the adversaries of the church do in their mischievous devices: for, as we receive all from our wise, gracious, and righteous God, it is not meet that we should quietly witness his dishonour, or neglect any method by which we may glorify his name, and promote his cause in the world.

THEN the prophets, ^a Haggai the prophet, and ^b Zechariah the son of Iddo, prophesied unto the Jews that were in Judah and Jerusalem, ^c in the name of the God of Israel, even unto them.

NOTES.

CHAP. V. V. 1, 2. A great part of the books of Haggai and Zechariah refers to the events here recorded, and the reader will find his account in comparing them with the history. The Jews resumed their work about fourteen years after the first opposition given to them by the Samaritans; but within two or three years after they had been compelled to desist entirely from it. In the mean time they had rebuilt their own houses, without being in the least molested. It may be supposed that they had an altar and tabernacle, and kept up their constant worship; but they were persuaded that it was not yet time to build the temple. For this neglect the Lord corrected them, and reproved them by the prophets, who came to "prophecy even unto," or rather against "them." Their remonstrances excited the rulers and the people to assume the work; and their subsequent encouraging prophecies greatly helped them in accomplishing it.

3 At the same time came to them ^g Tatnai, governor on this side the river, and Shethar-boznai, and their companions, and said thus unto them, ^h who hath commanded you to build this house, and to make up this wall?

4 Then said we unto them after this manner, ⁱ What are the names of the men that ^{*} make this building?

5 But ^k the eye of their God was upon the elders of the Jews, that they could not cause them to cease, till the matter came to Darius: and ^l then they returned answer by letter concerning this matter.

6 ¶ The ^m copy of the letter that Tatnai, governor on this side the river, and Shethar-boznai, and his companions the ⁿ Apharsachites, which were on this side the river, sent unto Darius the king:

7 They sent a letter unto him, [†] wherein was written thus, Unto Darius the king, ^o all peace.

8 Be it known unto the king, that we went into ^p the province of Judea, to the house of ^q the great God, which is builded with [†] great stones, and timber is laid in the walls, and this work goeth fast on, and prospereth in their hands.

9 Then asked we those elders, and said unto them thus, ^r Who commanded you to build this house, and to make up these walls?

10 We ^s asked their names also, to certify thee, that we might write the names of the men that were the chief of them.

11 And thus they returned us answer, saying, ^t We are the servants of the God of heaven and earth, and build the house that was builded these many years ago, ^u which a great king of Israel builded and set up.

12 But ^{} after that our fathers had provoked the God of heaven unto wrath, ^v he gave them ^{} into the hand of Nebuchadnezzar the king of Babylon, the Chaldean, who destroyed this house, and carried the people away into Babylon.

13 But ^{*} in the first year of Cyrus the king of Babylon, the same king Cyrus made a decree to build this house of God.

14 And ^b the vessels also of gold and silver of the house of God, which Nebuchadnezzar took out of the temple, that was in Jerusalem, and brought them into the temple of Babylon, those did Cyrus ^c the king take out of the temple of Babylon, and they were delivered unto one, whose name was ^d Sheshbazzar, ^e whom he had made [†] governor;

15 And said unto him, Take these vessels, go carry them into the temple that is in Jerusalem, and ^f let the house of God be builded in his place.

16 Then came the same ^g Sheshbazzar, ^h and ^b laid the foundation of the house of God which is in Jerusalem: and since that time even until now hath it been in building, and yet ⁱ it is not finished.

17 Now therefore, if it seem good to the king, ^k let there be search made in the king's treasure-house, which is there at Babylon, whether it be so, that ^l a decree was made of Cyrus the king to build this house of God at Jerusalem, and let the king send his pleasure to us concerning this matter.

V. 3. It is probable, that the governors of Samaria had been changed on the accession of Darius, for men of greater temper and impartiality. The companions here mentioned with the governors, seem to have been some of the chief persons of the nation who formed their council or senate. Excited, however, by the envy and jealousy of the Samaritans, they interfered, as soon as the Jews resumed the building of the temple.

V. 4. Then, &c. It is uncertain whether these are the words of the governors of Samaria inquiring of the Jews the names of their rulers, who presided over the work; (10;) or those of the workmen referring the inquirers to Zerubbabel and Jeshua for information. Ezra may fairly be supposed to have inserted the words of the record without alteration: so that the first person plural neither proves that he was then at Jerusalem, nor yet that he was not the writer of the history.

V. 5. The Lord so watched over his people, that the Samaritans, though full of enmity against them, were restrained from using any violence to obstruct the work; and he gave them so many encouragements, in his providence and by his word, that they were not terrified from proceeding: till at length the matter having been referred to Darius, a favourable answer was obtained.

V. 6—17. This epistle likewise seems to have been copied from the public records, and interpreted into the Chaldee language: but it forms an entire contrast to the malevolent, slanderous, and disingenuous letter of the foregoing chapter; as it fairly stated facts to the king; and the writers merely desired to know his pleasure, after proper

CHAP. VI.

Darius finds the decree of Cyrus, confirms it, allows out of his revenues the expenses of building the temple, and denounces penalties on all opposers, 1—12. The temple is finished and dedicated, and the passover is celebrated with great joy, 13—22.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

Though the enemies of the church be active, powerful, and malicious, and its friends too often dispirited and negligent: yet the Lord will not suffer his cause to be run down, but will raise up instruments to revive and carry on his work. It is the business of the ministers of God to warn, exhort, encourage, and direct all orders of men to attend to their several duties: when this is properly performed, it will be found the most effectual means of forwarding reformation and the power of godliness: and humble and pious men, in the most exalted stations, will deem themselves helped, by the faithful labours and animated remonstrances of those who really speak to them the message of the Lord. Whilst professors of piety are satisfied with their forms, and attentive mainly to their secular interests and accommodations, opposition may seem to be slain: but when they bestir themselves to do the work and seek the glory of God, it will soon be found that it was not dead, but merely fallen asleep. Nothing, however, can harm those whom the Lord protects, or cause their work to cease whom he employs. He fills the hands of some opposers, he restrains others by the moderation of their superiors; some are removed by death or by revolutions in governments; and some are softened or changed, as it seemeth good to him, "who worketh all things after the counsel of his own will." There are men who have no true religion, yet are possessed of equity, candour, and generosity: and these qualities entitle them to our respect, though they will not justify them in the sight of God. A fair statement of facts forms the honest man's best method of pleading a good cause. The servants of the God of heaven need not, and must not be ashamed of so great and good a Master; and it seems at first sight strange, that they should ever be tempted to so preposterous a crime! Those religious peculiarities, which ignorant slanderers deem novel or singular, may boast an antiquity beyond all other sentiments of the Medes, a roll, and therein was a record thus written:

3 ^b In the first year of Cyrus the king, ^{b i. 1—4. v. 13—15.} the same Cyrus the king made a decree concerning the house of God at Jerusalem, Let the house be builded, ^c the place where they offered sacrifices, and let the foundations thereof be strongly laid, ^d the height thereof threescore cubits, and the breadth thereof threescore cubits;

4 With ^e three rows of great stones, and a row of new timber: and let ^f the expences be given out of the king's house:

5 And also let ^g the golden and silver or observances in the world; and have been maintained by the wisest, greatest, and most excellent men that ever lived upon earth. Whilst we continue in this world, we shall always have to confess, that our sins have provoked the God of heaven unto wrath; and that all our sufferings spring from this source, and all our comforts from his unmerited mercy. We ought fully to acknowledge the favours that we have received from man; but should generally be silent as to the ill-treatment that we have met with. Even when we are exposed to censure, whilst the blame belongs to others, except the honour of God and the Gospel requires it, it is seldom useful to vindicate ourselves. The faithful worshippers of God are generally traduced, before they are persecuted: their cause only demands an impartial hearing to obtain a favourable decision: and many princes have persecuted more from misinformation than from malice.

NOTES.

CHAP. VI. V. 1, 2. The decree of Cyrus in favour of the Jews had been a matter of great notoriety, and not more than sixteen years had elapsed since it had been granted: but in the revolutions that had taken place, and the multiplicity of affairs which occurred continually in the government of so vast an empire, it is probable that its purport had been forgotten. When, however, it could not be found at Babylon, Darius ordered it to be searched for at Achmetha or Ecbatana, the chief city of Media; and there it was at length found, having probably been laid up in that city by Cyrus's orders.

V. 3. (Marg. Ref.) Some suppose that Cyrus did not allow the Jews to build the porch of the temple more than sixty cubits high, lest they should fortify it as a citadel; and that the sixty cubits in breadth included the chambers on each side the temple. Perhaps he permitted them to build the temple itself sixty cubits high and sixty wide, as well as sixty long; but they chose to build it of the same dimensions as their former temple: for it is generally agreed, that thus it was at last builded; and it is clearly proved, that the porch was raised to the same height.

V. 4. Expenses, &c. It is likely that the Jews had been deprived of this advantage, by the counsellors who were hired against them. (iv. 5.)

V. 6—12. Darius, in order to ingratiate himself with his subjects, showed respect to the memory of Cyrus in every thing : and this might induce him to be more favourable to the Jews, when this decree was produced. But he seems to have been deeply convinced, that the God of the Jews was the God of heaven; who ought to be worshipped according to the law of Moses. His steady intention that sacrifices should be offered, at his expense, at Jerusalem, “ of sweet savours to the God of heaven ; ” that the people of God “ might pray for him and his sons ; ” and the expression, “ the God that hath caused his name to dwell “ there,” show that he had been instructed in several important truths of religion, and had a conviction of his dependence upon God, and of the efficacy of the prayers of his worshippers, and entertained high and honourable thoughts of him. The account indeed given of this transaction by the Apocryphal Esdras is absurd, and inconsistent with facts ; for Zerubbabel had been long at Jerusalem, before Darius granted this decree. But probably some pious Jews had access to the king, who had so explained the matter, as to give him these favourable sentiments, and to dispose him to the service assigned him by Providence.

He thought that the continuance of his life, and the prosperity of his family, might be secured by the prayers of the Jews : but he seems not to have considered his future and unspeakably more important interests ; and his convictions do not appear to have had any abiding effect upon his own mind or conduct. Knowing also the envy and malice of the adversaries of the Jews, Darius denounced a dreadful punishment against those who should any more molest them : and he concluded his decree with a most remarkable execration against all kings and people who should attempt to alter or destroy the temple after it was built. Thus the Samaritans, by opposing the Jews, most effectually served their interests ; their governors, perceiving the king's inclinations, zealously concurred ; and so the work was speedily completed.

V. 13—15. If we allow a year for the message of Tatnai to the court of Darius, the search made among the records, and all delays and obstructions, for the granting of the decree, and its publication in Judea, we shall find that it was published just seventy years after the destruction of the temple by the Chaldeans. Zechariah, who prophesied at this time, mentions, that the people had kept annual fasts for the ruin of the city and temple, during seventy years; (Zech. vii. 5.) And this determines these events to the time of Darius Hystaspis; for no other Darius reigned in Persia till many years afterwards. The historian inserts the name of Artaxerxes with those of Cyrus and Darius, as concurring in this work: for though the temple was built before Artaxerxes came to the throne; yet probably it received great accessions of splendour and conveniency, under the government of Ezra and Nehemiah, whom he patronized. The temple was finished in something more than four years after the Jews returned to their work, when excited to it by Haggai and Zechariah; in something more than two years after the decree of Darius had been published; and twenty years after the Jews returned from captivity.

V. 17. The number, &c. The tribes of Judah and Benjamin, with the priests and Levites, which had constituted the kingdom of Judah, formed also the bulk of the people after the captivity. But numbers from the other tribes had been incorporated with them in the reign of Rehoboam, and afterwards; and many returned from Babylon, probably of all the other tribes. As the nation sprang from the twelve sons of Jacob, and some of the descendants of each of them remained; they were still considered as consisting of twelve tribes, and a sin-offering was offered up for each of them. Doubtless the same reference to the twelve tribes took place in respect of the shew-bread, and the writing of their names on the high priest's garments and breast plate, as when they had been united under one government. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 18. Moses had given laws, concerning the ministry of the priests and Levites, with reference to the place which God would choose to put his name there; and subsequent events had proved Jerusalem to be that chosen place. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 19—21. It is probable, that the returned Jews had observed the passover, before the temple was finished; but not in so regular and solemn a manner, as at this time.

V. 22. Of Assyria, &c. Darius, reigning over the country of Assyria, is here called the king of Assyria; though the Persian monarchy had succeeded to those of Assyria and Babylon. The pious acknowledgment of God in all these transactions, as influencing the king to be kind to the Jews, and as thus making them joyful, is highly rational: though it has now almost sunk into disuse, even among professed Christians.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—12.

Impartial and diligent investigation alone can give truth and innocence a decided advantage against lies, malice, and perjury: and much injustice may be committed merely through the indolence and inattention of magistrates.—Enmity or rapacity often intercepts the favours which were intended for the people of God; but when his plan requires the interposition of princes, he can easily dispose them to use all diligence, to exert their authority, and to expend their treasures, in supporting his cause; and for a time, these things have often been done by those who would not give him their hearts, and never became his true worshippers!—Did kings know their true interests, even in this world, they would support the worship of God, and give liberty and protection to his people; that acceptable services might be rendered to his name throughout their dominions, and that many prayers might be daily offered up for them. We ought indeed to pray for kings and all in authority, whatever be their character and conduct: yet we are very apt to be remiss and formal in this service, till encouragement enlivens our desires and expectations; but when princes decidedly favour the cause of truth and righteousness, the hearts of pious Christians are enlarged with hopes, and they pray for them with greater earnestness. Their lives are then looked upon as a public advantage: and their persons, families, and undertakings, as well as their immortal souls, are daily recommended to the favour and blessing of the Almighty, by those effectual fervent prayers of the righteous which avail much. Such as interrupt and injure the worshippers of God, when protected by the civil government, are desperate rebels both against God and the king: and even tolerating laws will be insufficient for the protection of the harmless servants of God, if the executive power do not vigorously interpose, to punish such as illegally assault them. But the Lord's protection alone can be entirely depended on; and he will destroy those persecutors who attempt to destroy his people, however powerful or numerous they may be.

When the Lord turns the hearts of princes, to strengthen the hands of his servants in their work; inveterate enemies will be overawed; indifferent persons will become helpers; the commandment of the king will be regulated by the commandment of God; and good designs, that had been long interrupted, will be speedily completed. The revival of public ordinances, where they had been obstructed, should excite our rejoicing, because honour is thus ascribed to the Lord, and benefit accrues to the souls of men. Nor can the remembrance of former sorrow, of present meanness and poverty, mar the believer's joy in communion with his gracious God and Father. When sinners are redeemed from the bondage of Satan, and separate themselves from the filthiness of their wicked connexions and practices; when they humbly seek the Lord, depending by faith on the atonement of the great Redeemer, attending his ordinances, and observing his commandments, according to the duty of their place: they are children of captivity, who shall be made joyful by his salvation; they shall be feasted at his table, and enjoy the light of his countenance, and he will be glorified in them, and rejoice over them to do them good for ever. As nothing contributes more to the conversion of sinners, and to the purity and prosperity of the church, than the holiness and faithfulness of ministers; let us all unite in daily prayers to the Giver of every good and perfect gift, that all who bear that sacred character may live and preach according to his holy word, and rightly and duly administer his holy sacraments.

NOTES.

CHAP. VII. V. 1—5. Artaxerxes here mentioned, was evidently a different person from Darius, (vi. 14.) Xerxes, the son and successor of Darius, cannot be intended: for he reigned only twenty-one years; but Nehemiah, who was contemporary with Ezra, mentions the thirty-second year of Artaxerxes, (Neh. v. 14.) Artaxerxes Longimanus, the son and successor of Xerxes, must therefore be meant; and the seventh year of his reign was no less than seventy-nine years after the proclamation of Cyrus. The temple had been finished, and its worship restored; and nothing very memorable occurred during this period. In all probability Zerubbabel, Jeshua, Haggai, and Zechariah, were dead long before this time: and the civil and ecclesiastical state of the Jews remained very unsettled, until this commission was granted to Ezra. He was the son, that is, the descendant, of Seraiah, who had been dead above one hundred and thirty years; (2 Kings xxv. 18.) Many other persons are omitted in this abbreviated genealogy. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 6—10. Ezra had no doubt been educated to sacred learning, and had made great proficiency in it. Having therefore laid aside other employments and studies, and taking great delight in the scriptures: and having an ardent zeal for the honour of God, and to be useful to his

ix. 7.

11 ¶ Now this ^b is the copy of the letter that the king Artaxerxes gave unto Ezra the priest, the scribe, ^c even ^a a scribe of the words of the commandments of the LORD, and of his statutes to Israel.

12 Artaxerxes, ^d king of kings, unto Ezra the priest, ^e a scribe of the law of the God of heaven, perfect ^f peace, ^g and at such a time.

13 ¶ I make a decree, that all they of the people of Israel, and of his priests and Levites, in my realm, which are ^h minded of their own free-will to go up to Jerusalem, go with thee.

14 Forasmuch as thou art sent ⁱ of the king, and of his ^j seven counsellors, to inquire concerning Judah and Jerusalem, ^k according to the law of ^l thy God which ^m is in thine hand;

15 And to carry ⁿ the silver and gold, which the king and his counsellors have freely offered unto the God of Israel, ^o whose habitation ^p is in Jerusalem.

16 And ^q all the silver and gold that thou canst find in all the province of Babylon, with the free-will offering of the people, and of the priests, ^r offering willingly for the house of their God which ^s is in Jerusalem:

17 That thou mayest ^t buy speedily ^u with this money, bullocks, rams, lambs, with ^v their meat-offerings, and their drink-offerings, and ^w offer them upon the altar of the house of your God which ^x is in Jerusalem.

18 And ^y whatsoever shall seem good to thee, and to thy brethren, to do with the rest of the silver and the gold, that do ^z after the will of your God.

19 ¶ The vessels also that are given thee for the service of the house of thy God, ^{aa} those deliver thou before the God of Jerusalem.

20 And whatsoever more shall be needful for the house of thy God, which thou shalt have occasion to bestow, ^{ab} bestow ^{ac} it out of the king's treasure-house.

21 And I, ^{ad} even ^{ae} I Artaxerxes the king, do make a decree to all the treasurers which ^{af} are ^{ag} beyond the river, that whatsoever ^{ah} Ezra the priest, the scribe of the law of the God of heaven, shall require of you, it be done speedily.

22 Unto an hundred talents of silver, and to an hundred ^{ai} measures of wheat, and to an hundred ^{aj} baths of wine, and to an hundred baths of oil, and ^{ak} salt without prescribing ^{al} how much.

people; he applied himself with great assiduity to obtain the suitable qualifications. He “gave himself wholly thereunto,” and was careful to do, as well as to teach others, the statutes and judgments of God. Thus he became very eminent, and waited for an opportunity of rendering important service to his people; employing himself, probably, in the mean time, in instructing the Jews at Babylon, as he had opportunity: and being a man of learning, ingenuity, and reputation, the king became acquainted with him; so that Ezra requested and obtained from him a commission to go up to Jerusalem, that he might regulate every thing which related to the worship of the God of heaven. The language used on this subject is well deserving of our most serious attention. Every thing is ascribed to God, to whom belong “the kingdom, and the power, and the glory for ever:” yet the agency of instruments and second causes is properly noticed. The word scribe here used, does not merely signify one who wrote out copies of the law, but rather an interpreter of the law. The scribes mentioned in the New Testament, professed to be interpreters of the law; but they in general “made it void by their traditions.” Many learned men are of opinion, and indeed with good reason, that Artaxerxes was the Ahasuerus, who soon after this married Esther; and that this commission, as well as that of Nehemiah, was obtained through her influence. (Marg. Ref.) kings tributary to them; but this title seems to savour of ostentation, as if they had authority over all other kings. The original letter is here inserted in the Chaldee language.

V. 13. The Jews, who had not taken the benefit of the proclamation of Cyrus, seem afterwards to have been restrained from going to Jerusalem, till this decree of Artaxerxes again allowed them that liberty.

V. 14. Seven, &c. Seven princes of Persia having conspired against, and slain, the usurper Smerdis, and thus made way for the family that afterwards filled the throne; the Persian kings ever after had seven chief princes as their counsellors, who possessed peculiar privileges, and joined with them in all public transactions. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 16. Canst find, &c. That is, all the money which he could obtain by the voluntary contributions of the people, whether Jews or Babylonians.

V. 18. It is remarkable, that a heathen prince should lay no other restriction on Ezra and his brethren, in disposing of the treasures which they collected, except that they should be employed, “after the will of their God.” The whole commission implied a chartered right to the Jews of living according to their own laws.

V. 22. As salt was offered with every sacrifice, Artaxerxes did not limit the quantity to be supplied, lest the stated sacrifices should be omitted.

24 Also we certify you, that ^e touching any of the priests and Levites, singers, porters, Nethinims, or ministers of this house of God, it shall not be lawful to impose toll, tribute, or custom, upon them.

25 And thou, Ezra, after ^f the wisdom of thy God that is in thine hand, ^g set magistrates and judges, which may judge all the people that are ^h beyond the river, all such as know the laws of thy God; and ⁱ teach ye them that know them not.

26 And ^k whosoever will not do ^l the law of thy God, and the law of the king, let judgment be executed speedily upon him, ^m whether it be unto death, or to ⁿ banishment, ^o or to confiscation of goods, or to imprisonment.

27 ¶ ^a Blessed be the LORD God of our fathers, which hath ^b put such a thing as this ^c in the king's heart, ^d to beautify the house of the LORD which is in Jerusalem;

28 And hath ^e extended mercy unto me before the king and ^f his counsellors, and before all the king's mighty princes: and I was strengthened ^g as the hand of the LORD my God was upon me; and I gathered together out of Israel chief men to go up with me.

V. 24—26. The king exempted all employed about the worship of God, from paying any kind of tax; and as the Jews were far from being in affluent circumstances at that time, it was a seasonable encouragement. He also authorized Ezra, as governor over the Jews who lived west of the Euphrates, to constitute magistrates under him, as he saw good. He allowed him to provide for the instruction of the people in the law of God, and even to proselyte the Gentiles; and he likewise empowered him to punish all who proved refractory, according to their crimes.—David, Jehoshaphat, or Hezekiah could scarcely have done more for the Jews, than this heathen prince did: except as their examples, exhortations, and prayers, would have concurred to render these external regulations effectual.

V. 27, 28. This pious scribe, instead of expatiating in the praises of his patron, or boasting of his own services, took occasion to bless God for putting such a thing into the king's heart! Whatever external decorations might be at this time added to the temple, the provision made for the orderly conducting of its sacred worship tended most effectually “to beautify it.”

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—10.

When the Lord removes some useful instruments, he raises up others to fill their places. They, who desire to be “scribes well instructed for the kingdom of God,” must lay aside all inconsistent pursuits and studies, and have their hearts purified from sinful passions, weaned from inordinate earthly affections, and filled with zeal for the glory of God, and love to the souls of men. They must prepare their hearts to seek the word of the Lord; that they may first understand it, then practise it, and afterwards teach it to others. In these sacred studies they should be diligent and unwearied; and meditation, prayer, and a spiritual mind will render them delightful. Thus they will become “able ministers of the New Testament,” “men of God, thoroughly furnished for every good work,” ready scribes, apt to teach, bringing forth out of their treasures things new and old: and beginning with faithfulness and diligence in a narrow circle, they may in due time expect, “according to “the good hand of God upon them,” to be favoured with more extensive opportunities of usefulness. But knowledge, even of the sacred Scriptures, except it be reduced to practice and communicated to others, will become useless and worthless.

V. 11—28.

The servants of God cannot vary from their rule at the instance of the greatest princes, or “teach for doctrines “the commandments of men;” but they may want the countenance and external assistance of rulers, in order that they may employ their gifts, and do their work, without molestation and to greater advantage. And when kings will grant them protection, intrust them with authority, and bear the expenses of their useful designs; and then leave them to conduct every thing by the rule of the word of God, and according to his will, as it appears to them and their brethren; they may without hesitation avail themselves of such assistance; nay, they may properly petition for it; when there appears a prospect of success. But in whatever way great and effectual doors are opened to them, they should regard men only as instruments; and ascribe it to the power and goodness of God, if princes grant their requests; bless his name for putting such a thing into their hearts; and receive a commission from man ^{merely} as an external opportunity of executing a higher commission from God, according to his instructions, and under his protection. The liberality of heathen kings, in beautifying the house of God, and supporting the expense of his worship, reproached the conduct of many kings of Judah, and of all that reigned in Israel; and it will rise up in judgment, and condemn the avarice of many nominal Christians, who refuse to employ their superfluous treasures in supporting the worship of God, and propagating the gospel in the world! Unconverted men may perceive that “whatsoever is commanded by the God of heaven,”

CHAP. VIII.

Ezra's companions, when he was about to go up to Jerusalem, 1—14. Finding no priests, or Levites, he sends to Iddo, at Casiphia, and obtains some, 15—20. They observe a solemn fast, to seek of God a prosperous journey, 21—23. Ezra intrusts the sacred treasures to the priests, 24—30. They arrive in safety at Jerusalem, 31, 32. The treasures, by weight, are delivered up, and sacrifices offered, 33—35. The king's commission is produced, 36.

THESE are now ^a the chief of their fathers, and this is the ^b genealogy of ^c them that went up with me from Babylon, in the reign of Artaxerxes the king.

should be diligently done; and that the neglect of his worship will bring wrath upon kingdoms, and upon the persons and families of princes. But divine faith alone, as operating by love and gratitude, is capable of producing unreserved, persevering, and delightful obedience. The exorbitant and pernicious exemptions, which ambitious ecclesiastics once claimed, have rendered magistrates reasonably jealous in this matter: but when ministers are poor and diligent, there would be a great propriety in favouring them with such exemptions as consist with the welfare of society, and leave them to attend upon their work without embarrassing cares and distresses. The wisdom, which God communicates through his word, is peculiarly useful in the choice of magistrates; that they may be indeed "a terror to evil-doers, and a protection to them who do well." It belongs to civil governors to enact laws, and to proportion punishments to offences, for the welfare of the community, the suppression of immorality, and the encouragement of those who endeavour to obey God and the king. And when wise and just laws are enacted, and impartially executed, it should animate us to proceed in our proper work with redoubled diligence and alacrity, in full confidence that the good hand of our God will be upon us, and prosper our attempts. But the weapons of our warfare, as Christian ministers, are not carnal;

14 Of the sons also of ^q Bigvai; Uthai, and ^r Zabbud, and with them seventy males.

NOTES.

CHAP. VIII. V. 1—14. Doubtless Ezra took proper methods of making his commission known to his brethren, throughout their dispersions: but, though extraordinary favours were granted, and the city, temple, and land were prepared for their reception, very few were willing to undertake the journey. Most of the Jews who remained in those countries, were either settled to their minds, or were averse to labour and peril. They probably had synagogues, where they met for public worship and instructions; and they were sinfully indifferent about the temple and its service. But God, on this occasion also, raised up the spirits of a small remnant to accompany his servant Ezra. They are here numbered according to the chief of the fathers, to whose families they belonged. Some of the names of these families were mentioned before, as the descendants of those who stayed behind seem to have taken this opportunity of following their brethren. Thus we read of the last sons of Adonikam, as no more of that family remained in the land of their captivity. (Marg. Ref.)

15 ¶ And I gathered them together to ^a the river that runneth to ^r Ahava; and there * abode we in tents three days: and I viewed the people and the priests, ^s and found there none of the sons of Levi.

16 Then sent I for Eliezer, for Ariel, for ^t Sheimaiah, and for Elnathan, and for Jarib, and for Elnathan, and for ^u Nathan, and for ^x Zechariah, and for Meshullam, ^y chief men; also for Joiarib, and for Elnathan, ^z men of understanding.

17 And I sent them with commandment unto Iddo the chief at the place Casiphia, and [†] I told them what they should say unto Iddo, and to his brethren ^a the Nethinims, at the place Casiphia, that they should bring unto us ^b ministers for the house of our God.

18 And ^c by the good hand of our God upon us they brought us ^d a man of understanding, of the sons of ^e Mahli, the son of Levi, the son of Israel; and ^f Sherebiah, with his sons and his brethren, eighteen;

19 And ^g Hashabiah, and with him ^h Jeshaiab of the sons of ⁱ Merari, his brethren and their sons, twenty;

20 Also of the ^j Nethinims, whom David and the princes had appointed for the service of the Levites, two hundred and twenty Nethinims: all of them were expressed by name.

21 ¶ Then ^k I proclaimed a fast there, at the river of Ahava, that we might ^l afflict ourselves before our God, ^m to seek of him a right way for us, and ⁿ for our little ones, and for all our substance.

22 For ^o I was ashamed to require of the king a band of soldiers and horsemen to help us against the enemy in the way: because we had spoken unto the king, saying, ^p The hand of our God is upon all them for good that seek him; but ^q his power and his wrath is against all them that forsake him.

23 So ^r we fasted, and ^s besought our God for this: ^t and he was entreated of us.

V. 15. Ahava seems to have been the name both of a town, and of a rivulet which ran into the Euphrates, near to the town. It is probable the whole company lodged in tents, during the journey, as well as before they entered on it. No Levites, who were not also priests, were found among them: for Ezra himself was a priest, and we read of two other priests who had joined them. (2.) A considerable treasure had been given to the temple at Jerusalem, by a Gentile king and his nobles; and yet no Levites offered themselves to take the charge of it!

V. 17. It is uncertain where Casiphia lay, or who Iddo the chief was. The Nethinims are called his brethren: and if he were one of that company, no doubt he had been advanced, on account of his extraordinary qualifications or services. Some, however, suppose the word rendered his brethren to be a proper name; and that translated Nethinims, to signify appointed. They therefore render the passage thus: "I told them what they should say to Iddo, and Achio, who were constituted in the place Casiphia." It is very probable, that there was at Casiphia a seminary for the education of priests, Levites, and Nethinims, over which Iddo presided: where they had the free exercise of their religion, and had so comfortable a support, that they were not inclined to remove. "It is very probable they had their synagogues—or other places, where they met for religious worship. For we find the people resorting to Ezekiel in their captivity, and him preaching to them the word of God, in many places of his book. (Ez. xxxiii. 31, &c.) And Ezra in all likelihood was an instructor among them!" (Bp. Patrick.)—Iddo, by reason of his age or his employment, was not desired to go, but to send proper persons for this service, which the men of understanding would duly explain to him, (16.) It seems Ezra knew that subordinate ministers especially were wanted for the service of the house of God; and was therefore the more earnest in this matter.

V. 18. Sherebiah, no doubt, was "the man of understanding" here meant; and the passage should be read—"A man of understanding—even Sherebiah." (Marg. Ref.)

V. 20. The Gibeonites were appointed to the service of the Levites, in the time of Joshua: and some think that others, perhaps a remnant of the devoted Canaanites, or of those who were vowed to the Lord by themselves or their parents, (Note, Lev. xxvii. 5—8;) were added to them, or placed in rather a superior station by David and his princes, or afterwards by Solomon; and that these were, strictly speaking, the Nethinims.

V. 21—23. Ezra had collected his company at Ahava, in order to enter upon a journey of several hundred miles, which they were almost four months completing. It lay chiefly through the desert: and, as they were encumbered with families and possessions, they could make but slow progress, and a feeble defence in case of an assault. They carried large treasures with them, which would invite the attempts of the Arabian free-booters and others who infested that neighbourhood. In ordinary cases it would have been very proper to have required of the king a band of soldiers and horsemen for their defence, which no doubt would have been readily granted; but Ezra, in order to impress Artaxerxes with a proper sense of the power and perfections of Jehovah, had confidently declared to him; "That the hand of their God was upon all them for good, that seek him, and that his power and wrath were against

18, 19. 24 ¶ Then I separated twelve of the chief of the priests, ^a Sherebiah, Hashabiah, and ten of their brethren with them,

25 And ^x weighed unto them ^y the silver, and the gold, and the vessels, even the offering of the house of our God, which the king, and his counselors, and his lords, and all Israel there present, had offered :

26 I even weighed unto their hand six hundred and fifty talents of silver, and silver vessels an hundred talents, and of gold an hundred talents ;

27 Also twenty basons of gold, of a thousand drams ; and two vessels of fine copper, † precious as gold.

28 And I said unto them, ^z Ye are holy unto the LORD ; ^a the vessels are holy also ; and the silver and the gold are a free-will-offering unto the LORD God of your fathers.

29 ^b Watch ye, and keep them, ^c until ye weigh them before the chief of the priests and the Levites, and chief of the fathers of Israel, at Jerusalem, in the chambers of the house of the LORD.

30 So took the priests and the Levites the weight of the silver, and the gold, and the vessels, to bring them to Jerusalem unto ^d the house of our God.

31 ¶ Then we departed from ^e the river of Ahava, on the twelfth day of the first month, to go unto Jerusalem : and ^f the hand of our God was upon us, and he delivered us from the hand of the enemy, and of such as lay in wait by the way.

32 And ^g we came to Jerusalem, and abode there three days.

33 Now on the fourth day was the silver, and the gold, and the vessels ^h weighed in the house of our God, by the hand of ⁱ Meremoth the son of ^k Uriah the priest ; and with him was Eleazar the son of Phinehas ; and with them was ^l Jozabad the son of Jeshua, and Noadiah the son of ^m Binnui, Levites ;

34 By number and by weight of every one : and all the weight was written at that time.

35 Also the children of those that had been carried away, which were come out of the captivity, ⁿ offered burnt-offerings unto the God of Israel, ^o twelve bullocks, for all Israel, ninety and six rams, seventy and seven lambs, twelve he goats for a sin-offering : all this was a burnt-offering unto the LORD.

36 And they delivered ^p the king's commissions unto the king's ^q lieutenants, and to the governors on this side the river : and ^r they furthered the people, and the house of God.

“ all them that forsook him.” Being therefore afraid lest the king should not at once understand the distinction betwixt using, and confiding in means, and lest he should be led to question the power, faithfulness, and goodness of Israel's God, or the sincerity of Ezra's dependence on him ; he determined to travel without a guard, except that of the Almighty, being ashamed to ask any other after his former avowed confidence in him. Yet, lest former sins should provoke God to leave them unprotected ; and in order the more solemnly and publicly to put the whole company under his gracious protection, he proclaimed and observed a fast, that they might afflict themselves before the Lord, in deep repentance and self-abasement. Thus humbling themselves before God, and seeking his merciful forgiveness, they besought him to be the Guide and Guard of them, their families, their substance, and also of their consecrated treasures. Accordingly he was entreated of them, their enemies were restrained or disabled, and they arrived unmolested at Jerusalem.

V. 24. Sherebiah and Hashabiah, before-mentioned, (18, 19.) were descendants of Merari, the son of Levi, and not of Kohath, Aaron's progenitor ; and consequently they were not priests. Either, therefore, the persons specified in this verse, were priests that bore the same names ; or they were the above mentioned eminent Levites, who on this occasion were joined in trust with ten priests, in the care of the sacred treasures. (30.)

V. 26, 27. These treasures are computed to have been at least worth a hundred thousand pounds sterling, besides the sacred vessels, which were very valuable ! All this was offered chiefly by a pagan king, with his princes and nobles !

V. 31. As Ezra departed from Babylon, on the first day of the first month, (vii. 9 ;) and having sent to Casiphia to procure Levites and Nethinims, the company set off from Ahava on the twelfth day of the same month ; it is evident that Casiphia was not far from Ahava. It seems Ezra was aware that there were enemies who lay in wait by the way, to assault, plunder, or destroy him and his company : yet he trusted in God to protect them, and they were accordingly delivered.

NOW when these things were done, ^a the princes came to me, saying, The people of Israel and the priests, and the Levites, ^b have not separated and will be honoured by God himself. When some of a family embrace the Gospel, they who linger behind may probably follow: till sometimes, in answer to fervent prayers, the very last are brought in. Alas! that professed ministers, who ought to take the lead in every good work, are generally so backward to labour, or venture, or suffer in the cause of God! And that they should need to be stirred up by the example and exhortations even of their lay-brethren! But such as address them on these occasions should be chief men, or men of understanding; lest they should be irritated, instead of being persuaded. They must not, however, be left to their negligence: and their superior brethren, having given them a good example, may send or speak to them, with more authority and effect than others can; and often those, that were before inattentive, will profit by meek and faithful admonitions. When ministers for the work of the house of our God are raised up, who are men of piety and understanding, we should acknowledge the good hand of our God upon us, and give him the praise; as we ought at all times to lift up our prayers unto him for this blessing to his church. It is an invariable rule, “that the hand of our God is upon all” them for good, that seek him; but his power and wrath is “against all them that forsake him:” and we ought to live in the habitual firm belief of it, and should not be ashamed to avow our confidence before the greatest monarchs upon earth. But we should be ashamed to act inconsistently with such professions, or even to appear distrustful of the Lord in the path of duty. On some occasions we should omit those precautions for personal safety, and refuse to make those provisions for our families, which in other circumstances are very lawful; lest our weaker brethren, or inquirers, should be stumbled, and so our God should be dishonoured. We ought then to ask wisdom from him, that we may know how to use or to refuse, lawful things, as expedient or otherwise; and we shall be no losers by venturing, renouncing, or suffering for his sake: as it is better to trust in the Lord, than to put confidence in princes, or in armed hosts. We should acknowledge him in all our ways; but we may especially confide ourselves and our works into his hands, when we are simply endeavouring to serve the cause of true religion. Instead of anxiously seeking help from an arm of flesh, (to which we are all shamefully prone;) when unexpected difficulties or dangers obstruct our path, we should more earnestly and explicitly commit our way unto the Lord. form the most effectual method that we can take: because they best prepare our own souls properly to receive the blessings, and most immediately lead us to seek the forgiveness and mortification of our sins; which are more formidable hinderances to our success, than mountains, rivers, seas, or armies of hostile invaders. Indeed few enterprises, good in themselves, finally fail of success, which are begun and conducted in this way. And when we thus humbly beseech the Lord, he will be entreated of us; and by his good hand upon us, we shall bring all our undertakings in due season to a happy issue.

They should be holy persons, who have the charge of holy things. Ministers are stewards of the most precious mysteries of God, and watch for the souls of men, every one of which is more valuable than all the world: and if any are wanting through their default, they will be required at their hands. The meanest of them, therefore, needs at least as much wisdom, vigilance, integrity, fidelity, and zeal, as the chief of those who bear the vessels of the Lord. And if any of us are intrusted with the gold and silver of the free-will offerings of our brethren, or the princes of this world, to pious or charitable uses; we should “provide for” things honest, not only in the sight of God, but also in “the sight of men:” that we may be able, when required, to give a punctual account of the whole to those by whom, or for whom, we have been employed. A clear conscience, and an evidently upright conduct, are both comfortable and reputable: yet our whole dependence for the acceptance of our persons and of all our services, must be rested on the merits and sacrifice of our great Surety: through him we must devote ourselves, and consecrate our services, to our reconciled God, and then walk before him in his commandments and ordinances, as we have opportunity and ability. “When our ways please the Lord, he maketh even our enemies to be at peace with us:” and if he dispose a few of the great ones of the earth to favour his cause; numbers will afford their external assistance, not to please God, but the prince. If preservation in peace and safety during our journeys on earth demand our tribute of grateful praise; what acclamations of gratitude shall we raise, when the Lord hath conducted us safe through the perilous and wearisome pilgrimage of life, and through the gloomy vale of death, out of the reach of all our enemies, into the regions of eternal felicity!

NOTES.

CHAP. IX. V. 1, 2. After it was known that Ezra was come to Jerusalem, commissioned by the king of Persia, to be ruler over those countries, and especially to reform all abuses in the religion of the Jews; some of the princes informed him concerning the gross misconduct of their brethren, which they had not been able to prevent. There still remained some of the old inhabitants in the borders of the land; and the Jews, being poor and exposed, opened an intercourse with them and with other neighbouring nations; and they soon proceeded to intermarry with them, in violation of the law. This had always proved an introduction to idolatry: and their sin was the more aggravated and threatened the worse consequences, because the priests, whose marriages had been carefully regulated by the law, (Lev. xxi. 7, 8. 10-15.) and the princes, to whom it belongs to enforce obedience to it, were ring-leaders in the transgression; and thus, both encouraged others by their example, and deterred such as wished to enforce the law against the criminals. They had not indeed yet proceeded to direct idolatry; but they were in the way to it, and already chargeable with doing in some respects "according to the abominations of the Gentiles." (Marg. Ref.)

V. 3, 4. When Ezra first arrived at Jerusalem, and was received with apparent cordiality; when he saw the temple prepared, and the worship regularly conducted, with apparent piety; we may suppose, that he was joyful and thankful. But having been informed of these forbidden marriages, which threatened a speedy repetition of former crimes and judgments, he was affected with deep consternation and sorrow; and he expressed his concern for the honour of God and the interests of Israel, by the customary tokens, and even by such as were used to denote the deepest indignation, terror, or distress. This seems to have been done publicly in some place of resort; and the matter being reported, many others became suitably affected, and trembled at the words of God, because of the transgression of Israel; and were prepared to join with him in humiliation before God, and in effecting a reformation. The Jews were here called, "Those that had been carried away;" which might remind them of the captivity from which they were lately returned, and which had been brought upon them by similar transgressions. Ezra observed a profound silence on this occasion, which indicated that the confusion and distress of his mind, were too big for utterance.

V. 5. Ezra seems to have chosen the time of the evening-sacrifice, to go from the place where he first showed his alarm and sorrow to the house of God; because the priests went at that hour, whilst the sacrifice was offering, to burn incense in the temple, and the people met together in the courts of the temple to pray.

V. 6. Ezra was not personally guilty in this matter; but he spake and acted as the representative and the mouth of the whole people; being a member, and in some respects the head, of that body, which had thus violated the covenant of God. He came to establish the civil and ecclesiastical state of the nation, according to the good hand of his God upon him; and he was ashamed and blushed, when he considered the rebellious and ungrateful conduct of that people, whose cause he had to plead continually before the Lord. Indeed the former crimes of Israel were like an inundation, which being swelled by their present transgressions, would flow even over their heads, and entirely overwhelm them; or they formed an enormous pile, which increasing by continual accessions of insolent and presumptuous rebellion, reached even to the heavens, to call down the vengeance of God upon them. The people, it may be supposed, persuaded themselves, that as they were free from idolatry, and adhered to the worship at the temple, all was very well and commendable among them; that such deviations were excusable, if not justifiable by necessity or policy; and that upon the whole they might expect the favour and protection of God. But this vehement language of this eminent man was well suited to show them their state and character in another light; and to convince them that they were very abominable in the sight of God, and in danger of his severest displeasure; and it loudly called upon them all, especially the criminals, to humble themselves before God in deep repentance.

V. 7. As it is, &c. Jerusalem and the temple had been rebuilt, and a remnant were returned from captivity; but the nation in general was in a dependent, impoverished, and abject state, in comparison with that prosperity which their fathers had enjoyed in the times of David and Solomon, and which they had forfeited by their sins; and the bulk of it yet remained in a state of captivity and dispersion.

V. 8. A remnant of the Jews had now occupied Jerusalem and Judea for nearly eighty years; having thus had a revival, for a comparatively little space, from the state of national death, as it were, which had continued during the captivity; and it might have been supposed, that the miseries of their ancestors would have effectually deterred them from imitating their crimes: yet in so short a time, they had made considerable progress in the very same path; and in case they proceeded in that way, a speedy period would be put to their glimpse of reviving and prosperity. — “A nail given them in the LORD’s holy place,” seems to signify, that the rebuilding of the temple, formed a sure ground of confidence in the Lord, whilst they adhered to his service, and hung all their hopes and dependence on him. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 9. The temple, being the pledge of God’s presence among them, was a wall, by which the Jews were effectually secured from their enemies: unless they provoked him to desert them. For it does not appear that Jerusalem was at this time surrounded with a wall.

V. 12. Nor seek, &c. The Israelites might seek the conversion of the heathen, or do them acts of common humanity: but they must not unite interests with them, nor seek their peace or prosperity in the land of Canaan, whilst they continued idolaters.

V. 14. Should we, &c? Both the judgments and mercies experienced by the people, aggravated the guilt of their transgressions; which would now speedily fill up their measure of iniquity, and bring final and total ruin upon them, except they took warning in time.

12 Now therefore ^a give not your daughters unto their sons, neither take their daughters unto your sons, ^b nor seek their peace, or their wealth for ever: ^c that ye may be strong, ^d and eat the good of the land, ^e and leave it for an inheritance to your children for ever.

13 And ^f after all that is come upon us for our evil deeds, and for our great trespass, seeing that thou our God ^g hast punished us ^h less than our iniquities deserve, and ⁱ hast given us such deliverance as this:

14 Should ^j we again break thy commandments, and ^k join in affinity with the people of these abominations? ^l wouldst not thou be angry with us till thou hadst consumed us, so that there should be ^m no remnant nor escaping?

15 O LORD God of Israel, ⁿ thou art righteous; for we remain yet escaped, as it is this day: behold, we are before thee ^o in our trespasses; for ^p we cannot stand before thee because of this.

V. 15. Though the Jews had endured many and heavy sufferings, yet they had been punished less than they deserved; for they had broken their covenant, and merited utter ruin. Whatever therefore should hereafter befall them, the Lord would be righteous in his dealing with them: and if they were yet spared, it would be entirely the effect of his mercy. Thus Ezra closed his address, without adding one petition to his humble confessions. He knew not what to say, or to ask, or to do. He could say nothing to excuse his people; he was sure they could not stand in judgment before God. He dreaded the consequences; yet he had not given up all hopes. His own mind was affected, and his manner could scarcely fail to affect others: and by this abrupt conclusion, as one who was assured that the righteous Lord would do what was right, he referred the whole matter to him, to do what was good in his sight.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—5.

Where a credible profession of godliness is made by great numbers, the eye of God often perceives, and careful investigation may frequently detect, many shameful practices: and those useful designs, which are undertaken with great pleasure and sanguine hopes, will seldom be completed without many anxious and painful sensations. — They that deal in frivolous, slanderous, and malicious informations, are justly the objects of public execration; but when a pious regard to the honour of God, and a disinterested concern for the benefit of the community, induce men to give information of gross and flagrant abuses, to those who are authorized to repress them; they perform a

NOW ^a when Ezra had prayed, and ^b when he had confessed, ^c weeping and casting himself down ^d before the most useful and honourable service: and even princes may glory in such an employment, though the criminals will generally hate and revile them for it. Men, that pride themselves in being free from gross iniquities, will often venture into the very path that leads to the commission of them: and even the miseries of sinners in the ways of vice fail to deter the spectators from copying their examples.—If we would, as the servants of God, a holy seed, devoted to him by solemn covenant, be preserved from the abominations of the wicked, we must separate from their society, and break off all connexions with them: and intermarriages betwixt his people and ungodly persons, have in all ages been a successful device of Satan, to prevail against the cause of truth and righteousness, and to produce apostacies, superstitions, idolatry, or impiety. Too often, through the artifice of the enemy, they who should warn or restrain others, sanction transgression by their own example, and by protecting the criminals from censure or punishment. Indeed formalists of every description make light of, and excuse such alliances or intimacies, and explain away the exhortation to come out from among them and be separate: but they that are best acquainted with the word of God, with the human heart, and with the history of the church; and that have the most affectionate regard for the souls of men, treat the subject in another manner. They mourn over such transactions, and forebode the worst of consequences from them; and are constrained most solemnly to express their concern and consternation. But, alas! the evils that are allowed and pleaded for by many who profess to be the holy seed, may well excite our astonishment as well as deep regret: and we ought to show our abhorrence of such abominations in the most vehement and decisive manner. When this is done by those who are had in reputation for piety or wisdom, it will excite the attention of others, and cause them to tremble at the words of God, because of the transgression of the people: and this will produce greater watchfulness, lead to self-examination and humiliation, and subserve the purposes of reformation. Silent grief and astonishment sometimes form the most expressive protestation against enormous crimes: and when men speak on such occasions, it may be more effectual to address themselves to God, than to the offender.

V. 6—15.

Whatever afflicts our hearts, we must not yield to inactive despondency, but arise from our heaviness, to spread our sorrows before the Lord with humble and reverent devotion. In confessing the sins of churches, or nations, all who form a part of them should bear a share: for every individual hath one way or other added his transgressions to the aggregate of guilt; and all are interested in the event, and stand related to such as have committed those crimes, from which they have been preserved. We should endeavour to affect ourselves and others with the greatness and heinousness of our sins: for, often when we think little of our transgressions, they have grown up even to the heavens, and are ready to overwhelm us with the vengeance of the Almighty. National guilt accumulates from age to age, whilst children copy the iniquities of their fathers. Hence spring all our miseries: in them all, the Lord punishes us less than our iniquities deserve; and no former sufferings will exempt us from greater in future, unless we repent and turn to God, and do works meet “for repentance.” Every respite and every degree of former mercies and privileges, should be thankfully received; but they all say to us, “Sin no more, lest a worse thing come unto thee.” Even the Gospel and the ordinances of God, which are “a nail in his holy place” on which to suspend all our hopes and interests, and which are given us to lighten our eyes, and to deliver us from our bondage, and to be a reviving to our souls, will only aggravate the doom of those who rest in them and go on in their sins. In this world God afflicts sinners, yet spares them, that his goodness may lead them to repentance: he corrects, but he doth not utterly forsake his people: he extends mercy to them, by disposing others to be kind to them: yet his favour forms their best security and comfort. But what shall we say, when judgments, mercies, warnings, and respites, leave sinners hardened in impenitence! The case is dreadful, and it may be expected that the Lord will be angry with them, until they are consumed without remnant or escaping. Indeed every penitent, reflecting upon his own conduct, and comparing it with his mercies, will be ashamed, and blush before God; his mouth will be stopped, and he will not know what to say. The law is holy, just, and good; obedience would have been reasonable and profitable; his guilt is undeniable and inexcusable; the wrath of God is dreaded and deserved: he feels himself in the Lord’s hands, without plea, or power to escape: it is of his mercy that he is not already consumed, and if he perish, the Lord will be righteous: his only hope arises from a belief of his plenteous mercy, and he casts himself before him with this only plea, “God be merciful to me a sinner.” And though the believer habitually walks in newness of life; yet even he often breaks God’s commandments, exposes himself to rebukes and chastisements; and must come ashamed, and confounded, and blushing before God, on account of his foolish and ungrateful conduct, and again adopting the publican’s prayer. Indeed every individual in the whole church, has cause to wonder, that his ingratitude, perverseness, and folly, have not wearied out the Lord’s patience, and brought utter destruction upon him. What then must be the case of the ungodly world

NOTES.

CHAP. X. V. 1. The exceedingly deep sorrow and consternation of so eminent a person as Ezra, with his prayer, and confession of deep criminality, were no doubt speedily reported all over the city; and the high esteem generally entertained of his piety and wisdom, induced the people seriously to reflect upon their conduct, and its consequences: so that numbers, of their own accord, gathered around the governor, and united with him in lamentations and humiliation before God. And the alarm becoming general, even the women and children joined the assembly in the court of the temple; probably fearing lest the wrath of God should immediately be poured out upon them.

V. 2. Shechaniah is not mentioned among those who were guilty: but his father and several of his relations are. He spake, however, as one of the offending community, though not personally criminal: and he would not be deterred from decisive measures by regard to his nearest relatives. Probably he observed that Ezra was too desponding, and ready to conclude that reformation would be impracticable, where so many of the chief persons were concerned; (Num. xxv.) But he perceived very favourable symptoms in the case. The people were generally convinced of their guilt and danger; and the most daring criminals would not venture to oppose the general opinion of the governor and the congregation. There "was therefore hope in Israel concerning this thing:" an effectual reform might be made; and then the Lord would turn from his fierce wrath against them, as always delighting in mercy.

V. 3. To put away, &c. This is not any where expressly commanded in the law; yet the spirit of the precept seemed to require it. The prohibition of marriages with idolaters was given to prevent temptations to idolatry: and the retaining an idolatrous wife formed a continual temptation. Divorces were permitted to the Israelites, by the judicial law, to prevent worse consequences; but the seducing of a man to idolatry was the worst consequence imaginable. This measure would also powerfully tend to prevent the contracting of such marriages in future. It is however probable, that none were put away, but such as continued idolaters, and that they were provided for out of the estates of those who divorced them. It does not appear, whether the children were generally sent away with their mothers, or not: but doubtless such were provided for, as were not admitted into the congregation of the Lord. Under the New Testament, the marriages of believers with ungodly persons are evidently sinful, and of very bad consequence: yet when contracted they must not be dissolved. The partition-wall between Jews and Gentiles is broken down: such matters are determined by the municipal laws of every country; and divorces, except for adultery, are disallowed.

V. 4, 5. Shechaniah's mind, being more composed than Ezra's, readily perceived that it was a favourable crisis for action: so that he exhorted him, instead of indulging grief, to arise and exercise his authority, and assured him of the hearty assistance of himself and others in the arduous attempt. Thus encouraged, Ezra entertained hopes of remedying the evil, and immediately engaged all present, by a solemn oath, to concur in this design.

V. 6. He did, &c. Some render the words, "Until he came, he had neither eaten bread, nor drunk water." He had no heart to take food, till the prospect of reformation opened to him; but spent his time in fasting, weeping, and prayer.

congregation of those that had been carried away.

9 ¶ Then all the men of Judah and Benjamin gathered themselves together unto Jerusalem within three days. It was the ninth month, and the twentieth day of the month; and all the people sat in the street of the house of God, trembling because of this matter, and for the great rain.

10 And Ezra the priest stood up, and said unto them, Ye have transgressed, and have taken strange wives, to increase the trespass of Israel.

11 Now therefore make confession unto the LORD God of your fathers, and do his pleasure: and separate yourselves from the people of the land, and from the strange wives.

12 Then all the congregation answered and said with a loud voice, As thou hast said, so must we do.

13 But the people are many, and it is a time of much rain, and we are not able to stand without, neither is this work of one day or two: for we are many that have transgressed in this thing.

14 Let now our rulers of all the congregation stand, and let all them which have taken strange wives in our cities come at appointed times, and with them the elders of every city, and the judges thereof, until the fierce wrath of our God for this matter be turned from us.

15 Only Jonathan the son of Asahel and Jahaziah the son of Tikvah were employed about this matter: and Meshullam and Shabbethai the Levite helped them.

16 And the children of the captivity did so. And Ezra the priest, with certain chief of the fathers, after the house of their fathers, and all of them by their names, were separated, and sat down in the first day of the tenth month to examine the matter.

17 And they made an end with all the men that had taken strange wives by the first day of the first month.

18 ¶ And among the sons of the priests there were found that had taken strange wives: namely, of the sons of Jeshua, the son of Jozadak, and his brethren; Maaseiah, and Eliezer, and Jarib, and Gedaliah.

19 And they gave their hands that they would put away their wives; and being guilty, they offered a ram of the flock for their trespass.

V. 8. All his, &c. That is, his estate should be confiscated, and put among the sacred treasures, and he should be treated as a heathen, and denied the privileges of a Jew: (Marg. Ref.) Doubtless, reasonable excuses would be admitted: and the punishment was only inflicted on the refractory, and those who showed a determination to oppose the measure. Ezra was authorized to punish such persons more severely; (vii. 26:) but he was not disposed to put any to death, if it could be avoided.

V. 9. For the great rain. The periodical rains common at that season seem to have been more abundant than usual: and as no building could be large enough to contain the whole multitude; this providential circumstance added to the distress on this occasion, and seemed an indication of the divine displeasure.

V. 11. As Ezra mentions only the strange wives, and not their children, some think that the children were retained, and brought up in the Jewish religion.

V. 12-14. The congregation at once declared their readiness to divorce their heathen wives, in all cases where it was determined to be their duty: but the difficulties of the business would require more consideration than could be given them in their present situation, and by a popular assembly. They therefore proposed, that the principal council or senate might convene at Jerusalem, who might summon before them the parties concerned from every city, together with the judges and elders of their cities; and so deliberately investigate and decide upon every case, that the business might be settled effectually, and in an unexceptionable manner. It would be needful to determine, whether the women had been proselyted either before or after marriage; whether they had relapsed into idolatry, or shown a propensity that way, or whether they had given satisfactory evidences, that they had sincerely embraced the Jewish religion. These and many other similar questions must be resolved, before sentence was denounced; and this would take up much time. The proposal was therefore very reasonable, and Ezra readily acceded to it, and thus the business was happily terminated.

V. 15. Ezra and the chief persons in the nation, as forming a council, decided on the several cases brought before them: and on this ground some think, that the four persons here mentioned, and no more, opposed the measure. The words indeed may bear that sense; yet the more general opinion is, that these four men were appointed by the council to bring the business before them in due form.

V. 16, 17. The cases, brought before the council, were either so many, or so complicated; that, though they separated themselves from other employments, to attend on this exclusively, they were two months in finishing it. This took place just a year after Ezra left Babylon.

fore this transaction: but his descendants had set a very pernicious example to the people. They, however, were the first to confess and forsake their sin, and also to present a trespass-offering on that account.

V. 44. Providence had so ordered it, that not many of the people had children by their heathen wives. Thus the separation was more easily effected; and at the same time it was a token of the divine disapprobation of such marriages. Perhaps these were the principal persons, who were criminal; for, all circumstances combine to induce an opinion, that a far greater number were concerned, than those here expressed by name. Ezra continued nearly twelve years after this in authority at Jerusalem, no doubt zealously labouring to promote a revival of true religion. And in many ways, he established the ecclesiastical state of the Jews; though he seems not to have been so well qualified as his successor Nehemiah, to attend to the civil government, to defend the city and state against enemies and invaders, and to effect outward reformation by the authority of the magistrate. Accordingly he is introduced in the ensuing book, as well employed in his proper line, though superseded by Nehemiah in his civil authority.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—8.

Genuine humiliation before God and sorrow for sin, always produce works meet for repentance. Yet they who are greatly affected with the view of the evil and aggravation of their own sins, or those of the community, are in danger of being swallowed up by over-much sorrow, and so discouraged from present duty. In this case the grounds of hope should be pointed out to them; and, (so rich is the mercy of God, through the great Redeemer,) that there is always hope for those who are humbly willing to accept his salvation: and when the most atrocious criminals humbly mourn on account of their sins, and tremble at his word, there is good reason to expect that they will obey his commands. In order to affect others with godly sorrow and fear, hatred of sin, or holy love and gratitude, we must ourselves be greatly affected: for, evident earnestness, in such important concerns, is far more impressive upon the mind by a kind of holy sympathy, than the most laboured eloquence or reasoning. Indeed the effect of such earnestness frequently bears a proportion to the rank, reputation, piety, or wisdom of him who is thus affected: so that the silent grief and consternation, or the humble prayers and confessions, of one eminent person, may, by the blessing of God, excite serious alarms and inquiries among great multitudes. These are critical seasons, and call for decision in proposing and executing measures of extensive, and durable usefulness. Yet vehement passions in those, to whom great concerns belong, are attended by considerable disadvantages; and far inferior persons may give seasonable advice, suggest suitable encouragement, or propose adequate assistance. We cannot too solemnly engage ourselves and each other, to renounce all interests, connexions, or indulgences, which are contrary to the law of God. And when leading men set the example, and then propose the same things to others, many may be prevailed on by conviction, fear, or shame: and thus opposition will be prevented, or rendered ineffectual. Excessive sorrow, terror, and self-abasement; and a great engagement of heart about the things of God and the eternal world, indispose us to animal recreation: so that fasting then becomes a natural expression of our feelings, as well as a suitable concomitant of our prayers and supplications. Fervent affections should not be allowed to subside, till our most beloved sins have been renounced; and we should know no man after the flesh, when a revival of pure religion is attempted.

V. 9—44.

That which must be done should be set about without delay: they are not worthy of the privileges of God's people, who will not concur in promoting obedience to his commandments: and they deserve severe punishment from the civil magistrate, who oppose his authority, when he is doing his duty according to the oracles of God. When the frowns of Providence unite with the terrors of an awakened conscience, to distress the trembling sinner, he becomes an object of deep compassion: and though no favour must be shown to his lusts, much tenderness should be exercised to his person. The most effectual divorce from lucrative or beloved sins, is generally preceded by examination and deliberation: for that which is hastily resolved, seldom proves durable. Cases, at first sight similar, upon mature investigation appear very different: and in correcting abuses, caution and compassion should unite with impartiality and decision; that there may be no subsequent cause for reasonable complaint. When sin is repented of and forsaken, God will mercifully forgive: but the blood of Christ, our Sin-offering, is the only atonement which takes away the guilt of it. No apparent repentance, amendment, or restitution, will benefit those who reject this propitiation; for their self-dependence proves them still unhumbled. It is peculiarly afflicting to a pious mind, (though, alas! exceedingly common,) to see those who fill up the most important stations in society, or the most sacred offices in the church, and who are related to the most excellent persons, leading the way, and setting the example, in the most evident violation of the divine law. But when they confess and forsake their sins, avowing publicly their dependence on the atoning blood of the Saviour; their pattern in these respects may in some measure counterbalance the effects of their former misconduct: and all the names, which are written in the book of life, are those of penitent believing sinners; not of the self-righteous who think that they have no need of repentance.

THE BOOK OF NEHEMIAH.

THIS book resumes the history of the Jews, about twelve years after the close of the book of Ezra; and contains their latest canonical records till the days of Christ, reaching down to about a hundred and ten years after the captivity. It was evidently written by Nehemiah himself, who throughout speaks in the first person: and probably it was received among the canonical Scriptures by Ezra and his assistants or successors. Nehemiah a Jew, the cup bearer to Artaxerxes king of Persia, hearing of the distressed state of his countrymen; in great affliction petitions him for leave to go up to Jerusalem, as governor, with a commission to rebuild the walls, and to provide for the security and the prosperity of his people. Having obtained his request, he executed his commission for twelve years with great success. After which he returned to Artaxerxes, but at length came back to Jerusalem; and employed various measures to promote the prosperity of the Jews, and the reformation of abuses. The frequent devout ejaculations, with which the narrative is interrupted, are peculiar to this pious writer: and his zeal, activity, and disinterestedness, are well worthy of our imitation: especially by those employed in arduous undertakings, for the good of the church or the community.—It has many internal proofs of divine inspiration, and always has been considered by the Jews as a part of their sacred Scriptures, and indeed a continuation of the book of Ezra: it does not, however, seem to contain any prophecies, nor is it explicitly referred to in the New Testament.

NOTES.

CHAP. I. V. 1. This book is here called, "The words," (or, as it may be rendered, 'the actions,') of "Nehemiah," that is, the history of the services which he performed to the Jewish church and state.—It is uncertain to what tribe or family Nehemiah belonged, though tradition records that he was of the tribe of Judah. His father Hachaliah seems to have obtained a settlement in the city of Shushan or Susa, the capital of Persia where the kings had a royal palace; and thus his son Nehemiah became cup-bearer to Artaxerxes. This was a place of great trust, honour, and emolument; and it was peculiarly desired by those who sought preferment, because it gave access to the king at those seasons of hilarity, when men are most disposed to grant favours. Nehemiah was cup-bearer to the same Artaxerxes who before commissioned Ezra. The month Chisleu coincides with part of our November and part of December.

V. 2. Hanani, the brother of Nehemiah, and some other Jews, seem to have come to Shushan, in order to solicit help from the king against their enemies. Nehemiah's station in the Persian court had prevented his going to Jerusalem: but he was an eminently godly man, and deeply concerned about the city and temple of God, and the condition of his brethren in Judea.

V. 3. The remnant, &c. Ezra's commission, and his attention, had chiefly respected the revival of religion, and the re-establishment of the affairs of the Jewish church: and he was not empowered or enabled to fortify the city, or to repel the hostile attempts of their enemies. It is supposed, that the Samaritans and other enemies, not only hated true religion, but were provoked by being dispossessed, by the return of the Jews, from the lands which they had seized upon: and as these were but a remnant, compared with the whole nation, and in an unsettled situation, they were unable to defend themselves. government was very distant; the king's lieutenants were in general unfavourable; and the king probably never heard a full account of the injuries done them. Either the walls had never been rebuilt after the captivity; or their enemies had thrown them down again, and burnt the gates with fire: and being thus defenceless and exposed, they were also insulted and reproached for their confidence in God.

V. 4. Nehemiah seems, immediately on hearing the afflicted state of his brethren, to have conceived the design of going to their relief, if he could obtain permission and assistance from the king his patron. But his first application was to that God, in whose hand are the hearts of kings. He therefore spent some days in mourning over the affliction of his people, and in humbling himself before God by fasting and prayer; in order to find mercy from him, and success in his undertaking.

V. 5—11. In the prayer here recorded, which probably formed the substance of Nehemiah's constant supplications day and night, he adored the greatness and terribleness of God, and his covenanted mercy to his people: and acknowledged, that if they had not provoked him to anger, by their numerous and heinous crimes; their enemies, instead of triumphing over them, would have experienced his terrible power by fighting for them. But, alas! Nehemiah was constrained to confess, that both the people in general, and he himself, and his father's house, were deeply guilty, and by dealing very corruptly, that is, perversely, ungratefully, and deceitfully, had given the Lord just cause to leave them in the hands of their adversaries. Yet, whilst he justified God in their miseries, he expressed a confidence in his mercies. The nation of Israel alone professed to worship and serve the God of heaven: he had forewarned them, that if they transgressed, he would scatter them abroad; but he had also repeatedly and expressly promised, that if they returned to him, and obeyed his commandments, he would gather them again to their own land, and to his chosen city. Now many of those, who had gone up to Jerusalem, were turned to the Lord, and “desired to fear his name:” (Marg. Ref.) and it might be hoped that numbers even of those who remained in other countries, were truly penitent and uprightly obedient; among whom Nehemiah was conscious he was one. And as the Lord had already done great things, both in former ages, and not long before, in redeeming and delivering his people from their enemies; he trusted that he would compassionately hear his prayer, and the prayers of all those who were pleading with him in that behalf. The particular request which he made on this occasion, is remarkable: He prayed that God “would grant him mercy in the sight “of this man.” The mighty monarch of the Persian empire would be addressed by his flatterers, as if he were more than man; yet Nehemiah knew, that in the sight of God, he was upon a level with his meanest subjects.—“A deep sense of our own unworthiness is a good qualification for the mercy we beg of God. This, Nehemiah expresses very sensibly.” (Bp. Patrick.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—4.

Eminent men of God may sometimes be found in situations where they might least be expected: his grace will be sufficient for them, wherever his providence has cast their lot; and it is seldom advisable to leave the place, where He has blessed us, without an evident call, or a substantial reason; even though we might remove into situations, apparently more favourable to our growth in grace. The church militant is like the bush which burned but was not consumed, because the Lord was there; afflictions and re-

Artaxerxes, scorned Nehemiah sad before him, asks the cause. Nehemiah, afraid, assigns the reason; prays; petitions the king; and obtains authority to rebuild the wall of Jerusalem, 1—8. He delivers the king's letters to the governors beyond the river; the enemies of the Jews are much grieved; and he arrives at Jerusalem, 9—11. He examines the state of the walls, secretly by night, 12—16. He encourages the Jews to build, 17, 18. The scorn proaches are its portion in this evil world: its enemies often presumptuously expect finally to prevail; and its friends in unbelief are sometimes ready to fear that they will. But in the crisis, some unexpected help is afforded, and again it revives and flourishes. No prosperity can render the real believer regardless of the interests of God's cause and people. The prevalence of iniquity, the decays of piety, and the ravages of persecution, whilst infidels or idolaters insult and reproach, are like "a sword in his bones;" (Psalm xlii. 10.) As a member of the suffering body of Christ, he will sympathize in its affliction: but this must not suffice. He will be inquiring, what service he can render to the common cause, by improving his talents and the advantages of his situation? If he has no more in his power, he may lift up his prayer without ceasing for the remnant that is left: and fasting joined with supplication may well express the believer's penitent sorrow for sin, sympathy with his afflicted brethren, his distress to see the cause of God run down, and earnestness in seeking help from him; so that he hath no relish for common comforts and enjoyments. Such fervent humble prayers have always been honoured with signal prevalence and success. And these seasons of humiliation are peculiarly suitable, when we are entering upon arduous or perilous undertakings for the benefit of the church. When worldly men would solicit any favour from kings or nobles, they spare no pains, to obtain the interposition of those who have influence with them: but the children of God must seek to their Father, who could at once secure them the assistance of all the kings upon earth, if good for them; and though other means may be used, yet "the effectual fervent prayer of a righteous man availeth" most of all.—As the people of God all over the earth form one body: it is good to inquire how our brethren fare in the most remote regions, that we may at least know in what manner we may direct our prayers and praises in their behalf.

V. 5—11.

In all our addresses to the God of heaven we must remember his greatness and terrible majesty; that we may worship with reverence and godly fear, and in deep humiliation before him. His infinite holiness, justice, truth, and power, are terrible to all the workers of iniquity: and they would be so to us all, were he not also infinitely merciful, and did he not deal with such as repent and believe the Gospel, according to a new and gracious covenant. For all have broken his perfect law, in numberless instances: and indeed all are disposed to reject, oppose, or abuse his Gospel. And if, by his grace, we are now true believers; we have even since we became so "dealt very corruptly," "in not keeping the commandments of God." He therefore is righteous in our sufferings, and merciful in all our comforts. We must still come before him as sinners, pleading his gracious promises, and craving to be gathered into his church, and finally into heaven, the place where he displays those glories, which here by faith we feebly apprehend, love, and adore. And in this humble supplicating manner we may expect all desirable success. May he then grant unto us a spirit of simple dependence on his mercy and grace, united with zeal for his glory, and affection to his people. May we endeavour to improve every talent, as those who are waiting for his coming; and never tarnish or defeat the success of our endeavours, by pride and self-confidence. And may our gracious God stir up those, to whom he hath committed many talents, thus humbly and zealously to serve his cause, with faith and prayer, with self-denial, promptitude, and diligence, and with simple dependence on him and devotedness to him!

NOTES.

CHAP. II. V. 1, 2. About four months passed from the time that Nehemiah made his inquiry, before he presented his petition to the king: for Nisan answers to part of March and part of April. It is probable, that his turn of waiting on the king did not arrive before this; and he could not come into his presence uncalled, except at the hazard of his life; (Esth. iv. 11;) but he could approach the King of heaven at any time, and doubtless all the while continued instant in prayer. Yet when at length he attended on his office, his inward concern was so visible in his countenance, (which no doubt had before been very open and cheerful;) that the king observed it; and, not perceiving that he was ill, seemed ready to impute his melancholy to discontent, or disaffection. Indeed the words rendered sad and sorrow of heart, might be rendered evil and rickedness of heart. This excited great alarm in Nehemiah: and in fact these arbitrary monarchs were generally suspicious, in proportion to their tyranny. Lest poison should be mixed with their wine, they required the cup-bearers to drink before them out of the same cup: and some conjecture that Nehemiah, being oppressed with grief, had forgotten to observe this custom. Had, however, the least suspicion been excited of criminal designs, the immediate torture or execution of Nehemiah might have been the consequence, for the Persian monarchs frequently with little ceremony thus treated those who had before been their chief favourites. He might also fear failing of his purpose, as the king seemed displeased, and no favourable opportunity for his request was yet afforded:

V. 3. Nehemiah in answering the king, testified his cordial and loyal affection, by wishing the long continuance of his life and prosperity in the customary manner. He perhaps meant the words likewise as a prayer for his salvation: but they were not generally understood in that sense. Thus "God save the king," as generally used, means no more, than "Let the king live and prosper:" but the words, when duly attended to, contain a solemn prayer to God, for his temporal preservation, and his eternal salvation!—Nehemiah said nothing to Artaxerxes concerning the religion of the Jews; perhaps he saw that he was more regardless in that respect than formerly. (Ezra vii.) Or perhaps he supposed that he would not attend to that subject so candidly from a young courtier, as he had done from an aged priest and learned scribe of the law of God: but some think he was induced to wave it, because the company present were unfavourable. He therefore represented the afflicted defenceless state of that city, where his ancestors lay interred; and how could he but be grieved that their sepulchres should be so disgraced? or how avoid sympathizing with his distressed countrymen?—Arguments of this kind the men of the world well understand: but, alas! they little feel the force of those which are infinitely more important.

Vol. II.—No. 12.

V. 4. Nehemiah could not in this emergency retire for prayer; but he lifted up his heart in a silent ejaculation to the God of heaven, to prosper him, according to the tenour of those prayers which he had for a long time been presenting before him; and perhaps the concluding part of the prayer contained in the preceding chapter, was secretly offered at this time.—"Prosper thy servant this day, and grant him mercy in the sight of this man."

V. 6. It is probable that it was Esther, the queen, who was present at this time, and that she seconded Nehemiah's request. Perhaps he had been preferred through her interest, and that of Mordecai: and her presence seems to be mentioned, as a favourable and not common circumstance, and an answer to his prayers. The king was not willing to be long deprived of the service of one, who possessed his confidence and affection; and we may suppose, that Nehemiah obtained leave of absence for a shorter time than he actually continued at Jerusalem: but he either returned to obtain a new commission, or had it renewed in his absence by the special favour of the king.

V. 7. Ezra went as a priest and a scribe, though armed with civil authority; and in consistency with his character and profession he would not require a guard. But Nehemiah went to rebuild the walls of Jerusalem, and to defend the Jews against their enemies: and it was very consistent with his avowed design, to petition the king, that the governors should be ordered to escort him with proper military attendants, which would both afford him protection, and add dignity to his undertaking. Indeed the king likewise ordered him a guard, till he had crossed the Euphrates, (9.)

V. 8. The palace here mentioned seems to mean the temple, or some of those buildings which surrounded it. Nehemiah proposed to build a house also for the governor, and to do all other things, which might place his people in a more secure and respectable situation.

V. 10. Sanballat is supposed to have been a Moabite, of Horonaim, a city of Moab: and Tobiah was an Ammonite. Moab and Ammon were subjugated and carried captive by the kings of Babylon: but it appears they had been restored, according to the predictions of Jeremiah. (Jer. xlviii. 47. xlix. 6.) And it is likely that Sanballat and Tobiah, (as well as Geshem the Arabian afterwards mentioned,) were placed by the king of Persia in authority over their own people, and the Samaritans or rather tribes in that neighbourhood, who were generally enemies to the Jews. Sanballat and Tobiah, however, were full of malice against them, and exceedingly grieved to find that one was come from the king of Persia, to protect them from further injuries.

V. 11. It would doubtless soon be known that Nehemiah was come with a commission from Artaxerxes; but he did not disclose the nature of his business, till he had made previous observations, and consulted with a few select friends, in whom he could place the most entire confidence.

V. 12—16. Nehemiah seems to have used every precaution to conceal his intentions, till he had obtained the unanimous consent of the people, and they were actually employed in the work; knowing that their enemies would attempt to divide or discourage them. We may suppose that the moon shone when he made his observations, and that he had provided skilful guides to accompany him in this survey. Yet even they, who afterwards presided and did the work, were not at this time consulted. The account here given, is well suited to show us the guineous and defenceless state of the city, nearly a hundred years after the return of the Jews from captivity; and Nehemiah's personal survey formed a suitable preparation to his address to the people, and would enable him to obviate any objections, and prevent any misrepresentations, that might be made. Nothing more is known of the several places mentioned, than what may be collected from the marginal references.

V. 17, 18. The reader will note the piety of the language, used by Nehemiah on this as well as every other occasion. When he exhorted the Jews to arise and exert themselves in rebuilding the wall of the city; he showed them that the kindness of the Persian king to him, was the effect of the powerful interposition of God in their behalf. Thus they were animated and emboldened to undertake the work.

V. 19, 20. Sanballat, Tobiah, and Geshem, as determined enemies to the Jewish nation, soon got intelligence of Nehemiah's designs, notwithstanding his precautions (vi. 17, 18;) and they attempted to deride the efforts of the Jews, as if the work was impracticable: nay, they represented the undertaking, as an act of rebellion against the king; though they could not but know that Nehemiah acted by his commission. But they meant, if possible, to frighten, to disunite, and to dishearten the people, that they might abandon the undertaking. But Nehemiah only answered, that the God of heaven would prosper his servants: and as to the Samaritans, they had no portion in him, no right to interfere; nor any memorial in Jerusalem.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—8.

Unavoidable delays, when employed in fervent persevering prayer, often forward the success of pious undertakings. — Though cheerfulness is in general an ornament to religion : yet there are also seasons for mourning when it cannot be concealed. The children of this world can understand the propriety of our grieving, when we are sick and in pain ; when impoverished, bereaved, or disappointed in our temporal pursuits : but they cannot conceive, why the heart should be heavy, or the countenance sad, if no outward calamity have befallen us. Yet conscious guilt, the fear or sense of God's displeasure, the afflictions of his people, the prevalence of impiety, and the decays of religion, are far more reasonable and important causes of grief ; under which no confluence of earthly delights can comfort the children of God. We must however expect that worldly men will ascribe such sorrows to melancholy, discontent, moroseness, or even some more criminal cause ; and they, who are strangers to the believer's consolations, are apt to infer from his complaints, that religion is uncomfortable, and unfits men for social life. We should therefore in general conceal our grief, or disclose it to the Lord and to his people. The very persons, from whose favour many advantages may be expected, are also greatly to be dreaded. Inconstancy is connected with all the partialities and affections of absolute princes ; and suspicions are multiplied in proportion as power is abused. They cannot confide in those, who do not, as they think, serve them from affection : but so many causes may induce courtiers to feign attachment, that they cannot but distrust at times even their favourites. Hence the speedy ruin or disgrace of those, on whom honours and emoluments have been most lavished ; without any cause, but caprice or groundless jealousy. " It is therefore better to trust in the LORD, than to put any confidence in princes." A meek and modest explanation best tends to banish groundless suspicions. Yet we should study consistency with our character, professions, and relative situations, and consider those of the person we speak to ; if we would behave " with wisdom towards them that are without," avoid giving any needless disgust, and do good to the church of God by their means. We must not speak falsehood ; but we are not bound always to speak all we think, when a part of it will best answer every useful purpose. Ejaculatory petitions may be presented to the Lord in any place or company, and should be intermixed with every transaction in which a Christian is engaged. They neither supersede, nor are rendered unnecessary by, our more stated devotions : and the habit of thus keeping up an intercourse with Heaven is of vast importance and advantage. Indeed we ought never to engage in any pursuit, in which it would be improper thus to expect, and seek the divine direction, assistance, and blessing. The Lord so orders every circumstance, as may best answer the prayers of his people. He turns their most distressing fears into grateful praises : he exceeds their largest hopes ; and even they, who know him not, will be inclined to favour his servants, " according to the good hand of their God upon them."

V. 9—20.

The enemies of the Lord must grieve, in proportion as his servants rejoice, when those in authority, and endowed with suitable qualifications, are raised up to promote the cause of truth and holiness, and the welfare of his church : for the enmity of the serpent's seed against the cause of Christ is confined to no age or nation ; it springs from hatred of God himself, and is irritated in proportion as he is glorified. But we ought steadily to proceed with our proper work, possessing our souls in patience, and uniting in our conduct, wisdom and zeal, vigilance and courage, self-denial and activity. If we even attempt any thing good, in a proper manner, " God hath put it into our hearts." But, we should first carefully consider what most wants doing, both in the concerns of our own souls, and in those of the church : and investigation will generally discover a great deal that needs to be rectified. When matters are fairly proposed, and men in authority or reputation take the lead, and animate others also, the most timid and indolent may be roused and encouraged to action. But favourable opportunities should be seized ; and they, who would accomplish any useful design, to rescue the church of God from just occasion of reproach, must be strengthened to endure contempt, reviling, and menaces, as well as labour and hardship. The God of heaven will prosper his people, and clear their characters from aspersions, as well as deliver them from affliction : but wretched are they, who have no portion, nor right, nor memorial in the new Jerusalem, the city of our God ! However, we should always be ready to give a meek and reasonable answer to objectors ; and, blessed be God, even despisers and revilers, whilst they are warned of their danger, may be invited to cease from their opposition, and to be reconciled to God ; that, after all, they may have their lot among his people, and not among his enemies.

high-priest, and his brethren, either his near relations or the chief priests, the heads of their several courses, rebuilt this part of the wall at their own expense; and perhaps some of them on this emergency laboured at it with their own hands. Of this part alone it is said, that "they sanctified it;" which may mean, that they began the work with prayer, and concluded it with praise, and thus consecrated their service to the Lord, for the security of his temple and worshippers. Little is certainly known concerning the situation of the several gates and places mentioned in this chapter. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 5. Their nobles, &c. The chief persons of Tekoah refused to give any assistance, either by their labour, their substance, or their servants. Disregarding the authority of God himself, whose work it was, no wonder that they would not submit to the commands of Nehemiah, their governor, who seems to be meant by the expression "their lord:" and for this they are branded with disgrace in the word of God.—But the inferior citizens, instead of following their example, undertook a second part, when they had completed that which was first allotted them: (27.) The expression put not their necks, renders it probable, that those who were well disposed, of whatever rank, assisted by their personal labours.

V. 7. The throne, &c. This seems to have been some judgment-hall, to which the governors of the kings of Persia came, from time to time, to administer justice. Probably Nehemiah now occupied it; for his particular commission superseded their more general authority.

V. 10. Several persons are mentioned who built, or repaired, the wall which was over against their own houses, or chambers. They lived near to the wall; so that this arrangement was most convenient for them: and thus at the same time they provided for their own security, and the common benefit of the city.

V. 11. It is not known what the expression the other piece, or the second measure, refers to.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

Ministers should always be ready to labour and venture for the good of their brethren; and they, who have the precedency, should take the lead, in setting that good example which gives energy to their instructions: but especially they should thus teach the people how to sanctify their secular employments, by beginning, conducting, and completing them with prayer and thanksgiving, according to the word of God, and to his glory. The security and prosperity of the church, in every part of the world, is the common cause of all Christians wherever they reside:

and all orders of men should assist in promoting them. No age, sex, or station of life, can dispense with this obligation: every one, in one way or another, may do something towards it; and where much is given much will be required. But, alas! the rich and noble generally count it their privilege to be useless, which they cannot be, without setting an example, mischievous in proportion to their influence: and no wonder that they disregard the proclamations of the prince, which call them to attend the service of God; when they disdain the yoke of the Almighty Lord himself. But before him they are upon a level with the meanest of their inferiors; except that a more dreadful punishment and deeper disgrace await their impenitent and ungrateful rebellion! Sometimes the zeal and activity in the cause of God, of those in the inferior orders, expose and condemn the pride, sloth, and self-indulgence, or impiety of those who are intrusted with more talents; and thus they whom men despise, obtain and engross that honour which cometh from God. If in times of prevalent ungodliness, numbers in different stations would agree, first to look to themselves, and to reform their families as far as they could: and then to use all their influence to promote the general work of reformation, much good might be expected to be speedily done: and though most men still neglect this their duty; let those who lament the triumphs of iniquity, and the desolations of piety, every one “repair “opposite to his own house, or chamber;” and let all endeavour to do what they can, by their prayers, example, education of their children, and pious conversation, to promote and recommend that cause which they have espoused. And when such attempts are directed by men of vigour, prudence, and piety, and conducted with entire harmony, to the exclusion of envy, contention, or divisions: and when every one, beside doing his proper work earnestly, is ready to assist those who are overburthened, there is no reason to doubt of success: “for the fruit of righteousness is sown in “peace of them that make peace.” May the Lord stir up the hearts of all his people, to lay aside their disputes, and to disregard their worldly interests in comparison of “building the walls of Jerusalem,” and defending the cause of evangelical truth and vital godliness against the

And may the church of Christ thus fortified, as “a city that is at unity in itself,” and adorned by the beauties of holiness, attract the attention, the admiration, and the love of beholders; silence the reproaches of calumniators, and dismay the heart or repel the assaults of every hostile invader! NOTES.

CHAP. IV. V. 1—3. Sanballat, and the other enemies of the Jews, though enraged at them for undertaking to rebuild the walls of Jerusalem, were restrained from openly opposing them, in part by contempt. They concluded, that either they would not venture on such a work, or if they did, that they would make little progress, notwithstanding their earnestness. But when they heard that all hands were diligently employed, they were very angry; yet they affected to treat the business with the utmost disdain. Sanballat uttered his sarcasms before his brethren (or the principal commanders in that neighbourhood,) and the army of Samaria; whom he knew to be more inveterate against the Jews, than any other of the tribes under his command: but he supposed they would soon be reported at Jerusalem, and tend to discourage the builders. With a mixture of scorn and indignation, he inquired, what the feeble Jews were doing? Could they think of fortifying so large a city? Did they intend to complete such a work in a day, and to secure themselves from interruption, while they spent the next in sacrificing? And what would they do for materials? The stones formerly used in this work were broken in pieces, or decayed by lying so long under the rubbish; the builders could not revive or make them new again, nor could they procure any others. With equal disdain Tobiah replied, that a wall built by them in such haste and of such materials, would be no security at all; for that the weight of a fox running over it would break it down! But this contempt and ridicule induced them to lose the opportunity of attempting more effectual opposition.

V. 4, 5. The Jews were at this time the church of

6 So built we the wall; and all the wall was joined together unto the half thereof: for the people ^a had a mind to work. 7 ¶ But it came to pass, that when Sanballat, and Tobiah, and the Arabians, and ^b the Ammonites, and ^c the Ashdodites, ^d heard that the walls of Jerusalem were made up, and that the breaches began to be stopped, ^e then they were very wroth,

8 And ^f conspired all of them together, to come and to fight against Jerusalem, and to ^g hinder it.

God: they were actually employed in his service: their enemies, without the smallest ground of complaint, despised and hated them for his sake: if they succeeded in their designs they would subvert true religion; and their condign punishment would form a salutary example to all other adversaries, and subserve the cause of truth and righteousness. So that zeal for the honour of God, and love to his people, induced Nehemiah to pray that these scorers might be exposed to that reproach which they cast on the Jews, and become a prey to their enemies in the land of their captivity, as these had been; and that their sins might not be covered, or blotted out, by the merciful forgiveness of God; seeing they had endeavoured to discourage the builders, and render them disaffected to their work; (Marg. Ref.) Such scriptural requests are prophetic, or declaratory of the judgments of God against persecutors: and the subsequent doom of these nations was an answer to this prayer.

V. 6. The half, &c. The whole circuit of the wall was completed to half of the intended height.

V. 7, 8. As all these nations, (except perhaps the Arabians,) were subjects of the kings of Persia; and were induced by Sanballat to unite against the Jews when acting by the king's commission, their attempt was a conspiracy in the most criminal sense. Dreading either his resentment, or the valour of the Jews; they dared not to attack them openly, notwithstanding the greatness of their malice.

V. 9. The connexion, here marked, between the greatest simplicity and piety in trusting God alone and seeking help from him, and the most vigilant and diligent activity in the use of proper means, is well worthy of notice.

V. 10. The princes of Judah, while the work was in hand, represented to Nehemiah, that the people were so worn down, and the remaining labour (especially in removing the rubbish to get materials) was so great, that their design was impracticable, and must be abandoned, at least for the present. This must have been a great discouragement to him, in conjunction with all his other difficulties and dangers.

V. 11. Some think, that the princes reported these sayings of the adversaries; in order to intimidate the builders: being themselves weary of the labour, and not cordially affected to the cause. But it was not likely, that Sanballat could introduce into the city so large a number of soldiers, as would suffice to overpower and destroy all the Jews, and stop the work, without being discovered, till he and his troops were in the midst of the builders. Indeed their conduct in reporting such a design was more suited to intimidate the inconsiderate, than to convince wise men that they really expected to carry it into execution.

V. 12. This verse is of difficult construction; and this seems to have been the effect of the abrupt manner, in which the persons intended expressed their excessive terror. They lived near to the hostile nations, and were continually coming to Jerusalem with information, that the enemy was preparing to attack the people from every quarter; and would certainly fall upon them, whether they continued at their work or attempted to return home. Probably they meant to put their brethren upon their guard; but these rumours tended to intimidate them, and drive them from the work. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 15. After all the preparations which Nehemiah and the Jews had made, their conspirators did not venture to attack them: and neither being able to surprise them nor fright them from their work, they for the present desisted.

V. 16—18. The builders could not possibly have made any progress, if they had literally held a weapon in one of their hands. Indeed it is evident, that they wore their swords by their sides. But the expression is figurative, implying that every man was both a builder and a soldier. They worked and bare arms by turns: they wore swords at their labour, and those behind them had other arms ready, when the alarm should be given.

V. 20. The priests were directed to blow the sacred trumpets; and no doubt one at least of them constantly attended, to sound the alarm when needful: and this was a token that the Lord would fight for his people against their enemies. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 22. They who lived in the adjacent cities and villages, were required to lodge, with one or more servants in Jerusalem, to guard the work, and be ready for it in the morning; for this was to be attended to in preference even to their own families, as being more exposed to the assaults of their enemies.

V. 23. Every one, &c. Nehemiah and his attendants, in order that they might always be prepared against any alarm, took necessary rest by turns, in their clothes and armour; never undressing themselves, except for cleanliness, or ceremonial purification. Or as the margin renders the words, "When they went to fetch water, they carried 'their arms.'"

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—12.

The pious labours of those, who try to promote true religion, must excite the indignation of such as are "haters of God," and his truth and holiness: nay, in this case, the wisest and most excellent behaviour will be reproached and derided as madness and folly. The most sacred things may easily be represented in so ridiculous a light, as to excite profane laughter: a small measure of wit, united with competent malice, impiety, and imprudence, will suffice; and such presumptuous jesters whet one another's ingenuity, and embolden each other to the most daring blasphemies!

Contempt and derision are indeed very painful to us: but they prove the Christian's protection, and give him leisure to effect his designs without more formidable opposition. The means which he uses appear feeble to proud despisers: but by the power and blessing of God, they produce durable and extensive effects; and all the efforts of man, seconded by the power and policy of hell, have failed, and ever will fail to subvert that cause, which infidels have dreamed would fall of itself, or on the first assault! Ere long the church on earth will triumph over every adversary; and all believers will soon offer the sacrifice of praise, for complete and eternal victory and salvation; notwithstanding the scoffs and rage of all their enemies. When insulted or injured, let us then give up ourselves to prayer: and the supplications of believers, throughout the world, for the prosperity of the church, and the spread of the Gospel, will eventually be answered in the reproach and merited punishment, of all impenitent opposers. As they reject the atonement, their sins cannot be covered; and their endeavours to hinder the progress of the Gospel will provoke the Lord above all their other sins. They, who disagree in almost every other thing, will often unite in persecution: and that enmity, which at one time dictates contempt and derision, will at another suggest more violent and cruel measures; especially when the servants of God are active, united, and successful. So that proud scorers are not fit to be trusted with power; whatever they may profess concerning candour and toleration. When we engage in important and useful undertakings, we should expect discouragement from every quarter. For we shall be tried not only by the anger, contempt, treachery, and cruelty of enemies, but also by the inconstancy and lukewarmness of friends and helpers; and many that wish well to us will weaken our hands by regarding and reporting the menaces, slanders, or boastings of our adversaries.

V. 13—23.

No opposition will prove any real hindrance to us, in our endeavours to do good, if we are led by it to a more simple

The poor Jews complain of their unavoidable debts, which compelled them to mortgage their lands, and sell their children, 1—5. confidence in God, and to the more diligent use of proper means for obtaining success. A believing remembrance of his power, truth, and love, will prove a sufficient support in every danger; for “if God be for us, who can be against us?” and, however craftily the plots of opposers are laid, he is able to detect them, and to bring to nought all their counsels. If our enemies cannot fright us from our duty, or deceive us into sin, or find us unwatchful, they cannot hurt us. When ministers, or other active instruments, add the example of diligence, courage, self-denial, and patience to their exhortations; others will be stirred up, who were before drawn or driven from their work. Every true Christian is both a labourer and a soldier, working with one hand and fighting with the other, and called by the sound of the Gospel, alternately to his work and to the conflict. We are widely dispersed in our several employments; but we all form one army, and must prepare to unite against the common enemy, in whatever place the assault is made. In this important cause, personal and relative interests must be comparatively disregarded: or rather they are most wisely attended to, when we commit them to the Lord, and labour for the benefit of his church. Whilst we stand armed and watching, as for the battle, we shall have the best security for peace; for Satan fears assaulting the vigilant Christian: or if we are attacked, our God will fight for us. Thus must we wait to the close of life, never putting off our armour, till our work and warfare be ended; and then we shall be welcomed to the rest and joy of our Lord.

NOTES.

CHAP. V. V. 1—5. It seems, that the attention of Nehemiah was interrupted, before the wall was completed, by the affair recorded in this chapter. Amidst the depredations to which the Jews were exposed, and their attention to self-defence, it is likely that tillage was neglected, and that a scarcity of corn ensued. It is also supposed by learned men, that these events occurred in the sabbatical year; which would increase the difficulties of the poor, as well as aggravate the guilt of those who thence took occasion to oppress their brethren. The nation seems also to have been visited with scarcity for their sins. Such persons therefore as were in low circumstances, and had large families, were unable to buy necessary food except upon credit; and they were also compelled, in the same manner, to raise money for the tribute imposed by the king of Persia. Of these difficulties the monied men took advantage, and obtaining mortgages of their lands, got them into their possession; taking usury also for the money, of one hundredth part every month, or twelve per cent. a year (as it is generally supposed;) which soon reduced the debtors to deep poverty; and at length to the necessity of selling into slavery their sons, and even their daughters, who would be peculiarly exposed in that situation; and there appeared no prospect of redress, no hope of redeeming either their lands or their children, no period to their accumulating distresses, but an entire and perpetual bondage. Yet they were not only of the same nature, but of the same chosen seed, the children of the covenant, equally with the more prosperous Jews. They had the same affection for their children, and accounted a numerous family a blessing, as long as they could provide for them. They had not reduced themselves to this distress by prodigality; but were necessitated to contract debts through hard times and heavy taxes, and for necessary provisions: and the conduct of their oppressors was contrary to the letter and the spirit of the whole law; (Marg. Ref.) In this extremity they appealed to Nehemiah, and he immediately determined to do them justice.

V. 6, 7. Nehemiah appears to have possessed a far more bold and eager spirit, than his contemporary Ezra. For, in a situation something similar, Ezra fasted, prayed, wept, and almost desponded: but Nehemiah, fired with a holy indignation, proceeded immediately with all his authority and influence, to redress the grievances of his oppressed brethren; neither fearing the resentment of their powerful oppressors, nor doubting but he should be able to effect his purpose. He did not, however, act without consideration; but, having formed his plan, he first rebuked the nobles and rulers, who, instead of punishing other criminals, were themselves the most notorious usurers and extortioners. And as he feared lest they should prove refractory, he convened an assembly of the people, that perceiving how generally their conduct was disapproved, they might be shamed into proper concessions, without the necessity of direct compulsion.

V. 8. Nehemiah, and Ezra, and other pious persons, had not only, with great zeal and earnestness, endeavoured to establish the security and prosperity of the nation; but they had redeemed from slavery several of the poor Jews, who had been sold among the heathen. What a contrast then was the conduct of these usurers, to their disinterested love! Did the one company redeem their enslaved brethren, that the other might sell them again for slaves, in direct violation of the divine law? Or did they expect to sell their enslaved brethren to Nehemiah and his friends?—It was impossible to reply to this animated and reasonable expostulation.

V. 9. When Nehemiah said, "It is not good that ye do," his words imply that they had acted very wickedly. (Marg. Ref.) The exposed and distressed condition to which sin had reduced the nation, and the recent mercies they had received, combined to enforce it upon them, to "walk in the fear of God," lest he should give them up as a reproach to their enemies; or rather, lest the heathen, who were full of malice, should reproach them, as they justly might, for their avarice and cruelty; and thence take occasion to revile their religion, and blaspheme the name of God himself.

V. 10—13. Had Nehemiah and his brethren and servants acted towards the people as these oppressors did, the authority of the Persian king would have enabled them to exact large contributions from the rich especially. But as they, instead of such exactions, did not so much as take what was justly their due; surely the rich should be ashamed of extorting from the poor what they could have no shadow of a right to! Nehemiah therefore urged them voluntarily to leave off their usury, and to restore the lands of their poor brethren, and the increase of money and provisions, which they had exacted from them; to lend them without pledge, or usury, in this time of distress; and to wait for payment till better times. This seems the immediate purport of his proposal: though probably he required the free remission of former debts, and the liberating of the children which were in bondage, as in the year of release. His remonstrance had its desired effect, and the guilty persons promised to do so: but lest they should delay, or go back from their word; he called the priests as witnesses, and bound them with a solemn oath to perform their promise: and then with a significant action, he denounced the vengeance of heaven in kind, against every one who failed of this engagement. To this the congregation solemnly assented, and praised the Lord for sending them so just and merciful a ruler. Thus this matter was in one assembly amicably settled, by motives and arguments taken from religion, and the law of God. Yet one of a similar kind distracted the Roman state for ages, and the oppression was never effectually prevented!

people: but ² so did not ³ I, because of the fear of God:

16 Yea, also ¹ I continued in the work of this wall, ² neither bought we any land: and ³ all my servants were gathered thither unto the work.

17 Moreover there were ¹ at my table ² an hundred and fifty of the Jews and rulers, besides those that came unto us from among the heathen that are about us.

V. 14—18. This passage must have been added by Nehemiah several years after the date of the transaction before recorded: for that occurred soon after he came to Jerusalem. The former governors had received from the people an income of about five pounds a day, (as it is generally interpreted;) besides a proportion of bread and wine for their households: whilst their attendants, as is too commonly the case, lorded it over the people, and increased their burdens. It is not said who these governors were. Perhaps Ezra, who seems not to have been rich, was necessitated to take sufficient for the expenses of his station; but we may be sure that he allowed of no oppression. It is however probable, that the Persian governors west of the Euphrates were meant: for they seem to have had authority over the Jews, until Nehemiah's commission was granted. But he, acting in the fear of God, and from the pure motives of religion, and perceiving the poverty of the people, would not receive this customary emolument: and being very rich and liberal, he supported his dignity with great hospitality at his own expense, all the time he filled his exalted station; setting his rich countrymen an example of receding from legal claims for the public good. At the same time he spared neither trouble nor expense in forwarding the fortifications of the city; and required his attendants to assist also; and would neither himself take, nor allow them to take, any advantage of the poverty of the Jews, by purchasing estates at a low price, as they might easily have done. In reading this account which he gave of himself, we should remember, that he wrote under the guidance of the Holy Spirit: and it was proper that his magnanimous, disinterested, and liberal conduct should stand upon record, for an example to all others, what use to make of great riches, how to render authority a public blessing, and how to induce mankind to justice and every good work, by taking the lead in them.

V. 19. Nehemiah had shown great kindness to his brethren, to which they had not in strict justice any claim; and he lifted up his heart to God, when recording it, entreating him to show like kindness to him. His conduct in these circumstances evidenced that he was a true believer: he desired no recompense from man, but confidently expected one from a merciful God: he evidently spoke and acted as one that knew himself to be a sinner; and he did not expect a recompense as of debt; but in the manner that the Lord rewards a cup of cold water given to a disciple for his sake. It was no more than St. Paul was constrained to speak of himself in his epistle to the Co-

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—13.

Every domestic or relative comfort may become to us an occasion of increasing anguish: we should not then be discontented in the want of children, or anxious about temporal things; but seek our whole happiness from God alone. It is peculiarly the duty and privilege of the poor, to trust the promise and providence of God to supply their families with food and raiment, and to be content with necessities: and of the rich, and of those who have no children, to contribute liberally to the support of their indigent brethren. But, alas! too many take advantage of the necessities to which others are reduced, in order to exact on them; that they may increase their own useless abundance, or support their luxuries and extravagant expenses. They wilfully forget that the poor are of the same nature with themselves; and that they have the same wants, inclinations, natural affections, and feelings of pain and suffering. Instead of doing to others as they would that others should do to them, they grow careless of the welfare, and callous to the miseries of their fellow-creatures, and usurp authority over them as bond-slaves, in proportion as wealth, power, and prosperity increase. Every gratification is deemed requisite for the lordly oppressor; but the meanest morsel is good enough for the poor and enslaved, though bearing a much better character than themselves. Thus men prey upon their own species, and by “despising the poor, reproach their Maker;” and aggravate, instead of relieving those distresses which are always entitled to compassion; but especially, when they are not the effect of extravagance or sloth, but of hard times, heavy taxes, large families, and debts contracted for bare necessities. Such conduct disgraces human nature: but who can express sufficient abhorrence of it when adopted by professing Christians? It exposes our holy religion to the reproach, scorn, and abomination even of heathen, and gives occasion to our enemies to blaspheme that worthy name, by which these selfish wretches are improperly distinguished! Yet in all the four quarters of the globe, millions of Mahometans and Pagans abhor Christianity, through the avarice, treachery, and cruelty of men called Christians!—Well then may the report of such crimes, and the cry of the oppressed, kindle an honest indignation in the breast of every friend of mankind, of his country, and of the Gospel. Those in authority should consult with themselves and with each other, how to redress these scandalous abuses: and if fair means will not do, rough and decisive measures should be employed, notwithstanding the clamours of interested oppressors, if princes would have the blessing of God upon their respective dominions. Too often nobles and rulers are the chief in such exactions; and their power and affluence seem to defy investigation, and frequently prevent or intimidate those who should promote the execution of justice; yet neither rank nor authority should screen them; nay, they should be first dealt with for an example to others: and if they disregarded the rebuke of an individual, the great assemblies of nations should be convened against them. If, however, they can be ashamed or persuaded into a proper conduct, harsher measures are ineligible: and when earnestness, affection, wisdom, piety, humanity, a decided example, and cogent reasonings concur, they will sometimes operate beyond expectation. In expostulating with selfish people, it is good to contrast their conduct with that of others, who are remarkably liberal and benevolent: but, it is best to point out to them his example, who, "though he was rich, yet for our sakes became poor, that we through his poverty might be rich." When this is compared with the conduct of those who care not how many they reduce to beggary or slavery, to enrich themselves; the contrast between the Master and his professed disciples is so striking, that it implies an argument, which is silencing, and unanswerable upon any scriptural principles. It may further be inquired whether such oppression is good in itself, or consistent with the fear of God, and a regard to his authority, and his command to love our neighbours as ourselves? Whether men can deny that the enemies of our holy religion do reproach us because of such practices, and are prejudiced to their irreparable damage? How they would like it, if their superiors tyrannized over and extorted from them, as they do from their inferiors? and what will become of them, if God show them no more mercy than they show their poor brethren? If our oppressors and slave-dealers were not by habit more callous than these Jews, we might be encouraged to entreat and beseech them to leave off their extortion; to make restitution to the injured, and to show mercy to the poor. But, alas! such methods are seldom successful; and more conclusive reasons alone prevail. This remains for the magistrate; and here the preacher must leave them. If arguments, expostulations, warnings, and persuasions will not induce them "to repent and to do works meet for repentance:" we must "shake off the dust of our feet, as a testimony against them;" assuring them that God will soon shake them out from their ill-gotten treasures; and cast them down into destruction, if they continue to neglect the salvation of Christ, or refuse to imitate his example of loving-kindness and mercy: and when the righteous Judge shall denounce this tremendous sentence against them, all the multitudes of the redeemed will cry, Amen, and praise the Lord. We may further observe, that wise and good men may be of very different tempers, and consequently go about the same thing in a different manner. But they should not censure each other, nor should others censure them: let them serve God according to that ability which he hath given them: and let it never be supposed, that one man is a perfect model for all others to follow.

V. 13—19.

We must not do our works to be seen of men, and it is seldom expedient to speak of them ourselves. Yet we should "let our light shine before men, that they may see our good works," and glorify God; and sometimes a good man may be called upon, as in his presence, and with an appeal to the consciences of many witnesses, to declare his own disinterested and upright conduct, and the motives of it, for a reproof, an instruction, and an example to mankind. But it is always necessary for those to set a decided good example who are bold reprovers, and active reformers of others, and who speak and act with sharpness against their crimes. In this case a man should give up his right, neglect opportunities of gain, be willing to labour and endure hardship without recompense, and even to expend his substance in the support of a good cause. And it is not enough for public characters to avoid evil, and the appearance of it themselves; their servants and dependants must be restrained also. But the fear and love of God, and genuine love of the brethren, will influence a man to this and much more; and will constrain him to abound in hospitality, and every good work, according to the ability that God hath given him. These are proper evidences and expressions of living faith; and our reconciled God will look for good on such as abound in these fruits of righteousness, according to all that they have done to his people.

7 And thou hast also ¹ appointed prophets to preach of thee at Jerusalem, saying, There is ² a king in Judah: and now shall it be reported to the king according to these words. ³ Come now therefore, and let us take counsel together.

8 Then I sent unto him, saying, ¹ There are no such things done as thou sayest, but ² thou feignest them out of thine own heart.

9 For ¹ they all made us afraid, saying, ² Their hands shall be weakened from the work, that it be not done. ³ Now therefore, O God, strengthen my hands.

10 Afterward I came unto the house of ¹ Shemaiah the son of Delaiah, the son of Mehetabeel, who was ² shut up; and he said, ³ Let us meet together in ⁴ the house of God, within the temple: and ⁵ let us shut the doors of the temple: for they will come to slay thee; yea, ⁶ in the night will they come to slay thee.

11 And I said, ¹ Should such a man as I flee? and who is there, that, being as I am, ² would go into the temple to save his life? I will not go in.

12 And, lo, ¹ I perceived that ² God had not sent him; but that he pronounced this prophecy against me: for Tobiah and Sanballat had ³ hired him.

13 Therefore was he hired, ² that I should be afraid, and do so, and sin, and ³ that they might have matter for an evil report, ⁴ that they might reproach me.

NOTES.

CHAP. VI. V. 1—4. Sanballat and his confederates, not daring openly to attack the Jews, yet earnestly desiring to prevent the completion of the fortifications which seemed to be at hand, formed a scheme to draw Nehemiah from his station, and to slay him; or confine him, when they had him in their power. They therefore, on some plausible pretence, invited him to an interview: but he was aware of their intentions; and on that account would not have gone if he had not been engaged. He, however, only answered, that being fully employed in a most important work, his presence was necessary, that the work would stop if he left it; and therefore he could not come. This was true, and a sufficient reason: and their subsequent importunity could not induce him either to comply, or to enter into any altercation with them: as indeed it was well calculated to confirm their suspicions.

V. 5—9. When these most inveterate enemies had been baffled in their design, they devised a more dangerous stratagem. Sanballat sent, under a pretence of friendship, to inform Nehemiah of a report in circulation, that the Jews were preparing to revolt from the king of Persia, and place him on the throne; and that he employed prophets, who should preach this to them as the will of God. This Gashmu or Geshem attested to be fact, and was prepared to prove; and being circulated in all the surrounding nations, it was likely soon to come to the ears of Artaxerxes, and to bring upon the Jews the whole weight of his indignation.

If such reports had indeed been circulated and credited, there would have been cause for alarm: for those despotic kings, upon the least suspicion, often drove their lieutenants into rebellion, as their only hope of self-preservation. But it was all a fiction to fright Nehemiah, or to render him incapable of proceeding. The letter was sent open, that the contents being known to the people, might excite them to mutiny, or to forsake the work, for fear of the Persians: and the proposal of taking counsel with him, as if Sanballat and his friends were desirous of concerting measures for the common safety, was an artful device, made in order to get him into their hands, that they might do him mischief. But Nehemiah, being conscious of his innocency, and satisfied that no such reports were circulated, only denied the charge, and let them know, that he was aware the whole was their own fiction: and, as they intended to weaken his hands from his work, he took occasion to “beg of God to strengthen his hands.” The words, “O God,” are not in the original; and some interpret the sentence, as Nehemiah’s resolution to proceed with increasing earnestness; but they seem rather to be an ejaculation; and the omission of the address implies the holy yet reverend familiarity, with which this pious man communed with his condescending Father and Friend, and shows that his heart was habitually employed in thinking of his God.

V. 10—14. Sanballat and his party being once more baffled, employed a still more subtle and dangerous expedient; suborning prophets to give Nehemiah bad counsel in the name of God. The principal person concerned was Shemaiah, of whom Nehemiah seems previously to have had a good opinion. He was shut up in some chamber adjoining the sanctuary, probably as a token of his own fear, and a sign to Nehemiah of what he ought to do; who, perhaps being sent to, went to confer with him, as a friend and a prophet. The environs of the temple were secured by walls and gates; whilst the gates of the city were not set up. Shemaiah therefore pretended great concern for Nehemiah's safety, and counselled him to take refuge in the temple with him, lest his enemies should come and murder him by night; or that very night, as his words seem to imply. If Nehemiah had followed this advice, he would have lost his reputation for courage and confidence in God; and have appeared weak and contemptible: the people would have taken the alarm, deserted the work, and shifted for their safety: the accusations of his enemies would have gained credit, even in the Persian court; and he would have seemed conscious of bad intentions. In short, it would have overturned his whole design, and given his enemies their desired advantage. But Nehemiah soon saw through this project likewise. From the nature of the counsel, and by proper investigation, he perceived that Shemaiah was not delivering a message from God; but that he pronounced this prophecy against him, intending his ruin, having been hired by Tobiah and Sanballat, that Nehemiah might contract guilt, and expose himself to reproach.—

When the rank of Nehemiah and his authority were considered, with his conscious integrity and professed confidence in God; and the importance of his work, it appeared very inconsistent for him to flee and hide himself. In such circumstances, even the preservation of life formed but a subordinate consideration: the support of the public cause, by an example of intrepidity, firmness, and consistency, was to be first considered. Any brave commander would venture his life, when the event of a decisive battle, and the fate of his country were at stake, and would scorn to flee at the appearance of danger: how much more then should Nehemiah venture his, for the glory of God and the benefit of his church! To take refuge in the temple in such a case would be to prefer a disgraceful short-lived safety to the most important of all causes. Nehemiah, therefore, not only with decided firmness rejected this counsel, as inconsistent with the most evident scriptural principles: but, as Shemaiah, and Noadiah the prophetess, and the other pretended prophets, had most basely sold their services to the enemies of God and religion; he joins along with them in his prayers for their confusion and disappointment.

V. 15, 16. This important and difficult work was completed in so short a time, and under so many disadvantages, that even the adversaries of the Jews were convinced that God had prospered them. He had given them health, strength, courage, and unity; he had restrained their opposers, and kept off interruptions; and he succeeded the whole by his blessing: so that “the work was wrought of their God.” This dejected their enemies, and made them forebode the future prevalence of the Jews; but it did not allure them to desire a portion among that favoured people. (Num. xxiii. 23.)

V. 17—19. Whilst the wall was building, and afterwards, several of the nobles of Judah were in the interest of Tobiah, and held a traitorous correspondence with him: some of them, having joined affinity with him, had engaged others to swear to serve him, as they had opportunity. Nay, they had the confidence, or rather insolence, to report the good deeds, or supposed excellent endowments of this bitter enemy of God and his people, to Nehemiah; either intimating to him that he should copy them, or that he should form an alliance with so worthy a character! And at the same time they betrayed Nehemiah's measures to him. But this pious and excellent man, who had so strenuously pleaded the cause of the oppressed poor, would not, in his present circumstances, exercise the authority with which he was invested against his own enemies in Judah, however basely they acted towards him; but persevered in serving his people, notwithstanding their treachery and ingratitude!

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—9.

The whole power and policy of Satan and his servants have always been directed against those who zealously seek the welfare of the church of God: and though often baffled, they are unwearied in their projects. The rage of persecutors, though terrible, is not so dangerous as the professed friendship of enemies. So that, except there is good evidence of men's reconciliation to God, they cannot safely be trusted when they court the favour of his people, but should rather be suspected of some mischievous design. If we receive no other damage from their insincere friendship, we should thereby be taken off from our work to no purpose: we should not then suffer ourselves to be overcome by importunity; for we had better offend man by a refusal, than sin against our God by compliance. Even our common lawful business ought to have a decided preference to all matters of mere compliment: how much more then our peculiar duties as Christians, magistrates, or ministers, in proportion to their importance and difficulty! It is therefore desirable to be constantly engaged in some useful employ; among other reasons, that we may have an answer ready for those invitations which we cannot profitably accept of, and scarcely know how to refuse. The active servant of God may, on any such occasion, say, "I am doing a great work, so that I cannot come down; why should the work cease, while I leave it, and come down to you?" And this is enough, as a reason for avoiding those circles where no good can be got or done; and which interfere with the duties of the closet and the family, and prevent the redeeming of our time, and the improvement of our talents. The deceitful smiles of the world generally form our first temptations in the path of duty. But if we steadfastly withstand them, and will not be diverted from our work; we must prepare for reproaches, slanders, and menaces from the same quarter. Our firmness will be called obstinacy, our zeal, rashness, and our activity, ambition: nay, we shall be warned, that we are about to affront all our friends, and turn them into enemies; and to bring ourselves into dangers and difficulties, from which we cannot extricate ourselves, unless we follow other counsels, and act more circumspectly. Moreover, the zealous servants of God have always been unjustly traduced as rebellious to the ruling powers: and their malicious enemies have often represented their own slanders, as the general sentiments of mankind. Such misrepresentations tend to weaken the hands of the most courageous; and they prejudice, alarm, and draw off such as were helpful to their pious designs. But a clear conscience, a lively faith, an assured persuasion that we are doing our duty, and a zeal for the honour of God, will carry us above such discouragements: and being satisfied with denying the charges brought against us, it is best to persevere in our work, without wasting time in altercations or self-vindication; only lifting up our prayer to God to strengthen our hands, and encourage our hearts.

V. 10—19.

A thousand slanders will die away, one after another; whilst the malice of the authors of them shall be exposed; but one real crime sometimes leaves an indelible stain upon a man's character, and precludes all his future usefulness: let us then fear the least sin far more than any calumny. But those temptations are the most dangerous of all, which come from professed servants of God, and friends to us.

When such persons, with apparent piety and affection, counsel the zealous to be more moderate and cautious, the diligent to spare himself, and the bold, to take care of himself; the insinuation has great effect. Our appeal, however, in this case, must be to the word of God. That cannot be from him, let who will speak it, which contradicts his plain precept or truth; or which would induce us to neglect our duty, or prefer our own ease, emolument, credit, liberty, or life, to his glory and the welfare of his church; or which would persuade us to shrink from the cross, or refuse self-denial. Many such counsellors are in the pay of the enemy: for, being induced to time-serving from interested motives, they consider the conduct of the more zealous as a reproach, and want to be kept in countenance by their example: and if we knew from what motives grave advice is sometimes given, we should understand from what quarter it came, without further information. We need not always, however, judge the adviser; but we ought to try the advice, and without scruple to reject all that is contrary to the word of God. Every man should also study consistency with his profession, former character, station, and engagements. That which is allowable in one man, may be very improper in another: and we ought to venture any thing in a good cause, trusting in the Lord, and committing ourselves to his protection. It is therefore useful frequently to inquire, 'Should such a man as I do so and so?' 'Should I, who am a Christian, a saint, a child of God, a member of Christ, a temple of the Holy Spirit, a ransomed sinner, an heir of heaven; one set up to be a light in the world, and the salt of the earth; a preacher of righteousness, and a steward of the mysteries of God: should I appear to be covetous, or sensual, or proud, or envious? Should I yield to impatience, discontent, or anger? Should I be slothful, unbelieving, or unmerciful? What effects will such conduct in me have upon others? Will not some be grieved, others misled and prejudiced; others emboldened in ungodliness, and enmity to the truth? Will not this prevent the effect of my exhortations or persuasions in my family, amongst my connexions, or from the pulpit?' Thus, all that God hath done for us or by us, may become an argument for watchfulness, diligence, self-denial, and perseverance. It is also peculiarly instructive to consider how others in similar circumstances would act. Would Peter or Paul have done so, to save their money, to indulge their sloth or pride, to escape a cross, a prison, or death? Do the men of the world suffer themselves so easily to be diverted from their object, by every appearance of difficulty or peril?—In all cases, indeed, they who would lead others in arduous services, must share the danger and the hardship: and this is the reason why the enemy of souls employs so many instruments and forms so many projects, to discourage, or bring a reproach on, the active servants of God. If the shepherd can be frighted away, the flock will be scattered. Every success of the Gospel discourages the enemies of God: and they sometimes perceive that it is his work, and yet hate it the more! but false brethren are the severest trial to his faithful servants: "they who forsake the Lord praise the "wicked;" and they that form marriages with the avowed opposers of the Gospel, will probably soon join their party, notwithstanding their present pretensions. Many leading men, yea, preachers and prophets in the visible church of God, will be found workers of iniquity. But under every discouragement, we should "consider Jesus, who endured

"the contradiction of sinners against himself, lest we be
"weary, and faint in our mind:" and who "laid down
"his life for his sheep;" that after his example we may persevere in our duty amidst every danger and opposition, not being overcome by the treachery, ingratitude, or perverseness of those around us, but still endeavouring to overcome evil with good; and "in due season we shall "reap, if we faint not."

NOTES.

CHAP. VII. V. 1. The singers, &c. This either refers to some regulations made by Nehemiah concerning the ministrations of the Levites at the temple; or to his preparations for solemnly dedicating the wall. (xii.)

V. 2, 3. It has been supposed that Nehemiah, having finished the wall and made other needful regulations, returned to the Persian court; but that he not long after came again to Jerusalem with a new commission: and that on this occasion he placed his brother Hanani, (i. 2.) and Hananiah over the city, and gave them instructions how to manage in his absence. The charge however here given, and the service required, would be necessary even when Nehemiah resided at Jerusalem: for he could not superintend the gates and the watchmen, without being taken off from his other important and numerous engagements.
Doubtless Hanani was a proper person, or else Nehemiah would not have preferred him to this important trust; but of Hananiah it is expressly said, that "he was a faithful "man, and feared God above many;" being possessed with a deep sense of religion, he was a man of singular fidelity and integrity, and one who might be thoroughly confided in.

V. 4. The walls had been built upon their old foundations, in confidence that God in due time would replenish the city: but there were only a small number of inhabitants compared with those of former ages; so that large spaces remained unoccupied. This would render it the more requisite that a strict watch should be kept, lest their enemies should scale the walls unobserved; and thus measures for replenishing the city with inhabitants were become necessary.

V. 5, 6. This account was taken of the people, in order to bring the tenth part of them to reside in Jerusalem, (xi. 1:) and as it proved a useful measure, Nehemiah justly and piously ascribed the first thought of it to God, who put it into his heart. In conducting this business, he found the register of those who came up with Zerubbabel; which is here inserted nearly as we had it before. But why the old register was again inserted, and the new one, formed by Nehemiah on the same plan, was omitted, does not appear. Indeed some learned men suppose that this is the new register, and thus account for the variations in it from that in Ezra. But as by far the greatest part of the families consist of exactly the same number in both places; and the sum total in each, with several other particulars, entirely coincides, it can hardly be conceived, that almost a hundred years should have made no greater changes.
Should any, however, conjecture that some ancient copyist had inserted the wrong register, and that his mistake had been generally followed, the very conclusion would show, that such alterations are almost always liable to detection;
and no reasonable man would think it the least objection to the divine inspiration of the sacred Scriptures.

V. 70—72. This seems to have been a distinct obligation from that recorded in Ezra; and was probably made after the people were registered, by Nehemiah, the Tirshatha or governor, and the chief of the people.

V. 73. It is remarkable, that this registering took place at the same time of the year in which the people with Zerubbabel arrived at Jerusalem. If the events next recorded took place in the same year with the building of the wall, (as it is probable they did,) there could be no time for Nehemiah to go to Babylon: for Elul was the sixth month. (vi. 15.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The active servants of God and his Church will never want employment; for the completion of one design will make way for the commencement of another. The fear of God, powerfully possessing the heart, will produce proportionable fidelity and conscientiousness in a man's whole character and conduct: and it is happy for the community, when men of this character have the charge of public affairs.—“Except the Lord keep the city,” the walls are built, and “the watchmen wake in vain:” yet in this and all other concerns, God is to be trusted in the use of prudent and proper means, and not to be tempted by the neglect of them. Magistrates and ministers have more extensive charges: but every man ought to watch over his own heart and his own house, that sin, the worst enemy, may be kept out at a distance, as much as possible. Provision is made in the Gospel, and in the city of our God for far greater numbers than have yet been enrolled citizens: we should therefore be devising means for replenishing it with inhabitants, as well as for building its walls. “All holy desires, all good counsels, and all just works are ‘from God:’ to him belongs the praise, when good thoughts are suggested; we should be careful not to “quench the “Spirit,” by rejecting them: and we ought continually to pray, that our God would put more and more of them into our hearts, and enable us to bring them to good effect; and that he would do the same for increasing numbers. Then we might hope that many would concur in designs, as yet unthought of, for spreading the Gospel and promoting the salvation of souls. The Lord delighteth to honour those who willingly face danger and endure hardship for his sake: he knoweth the names of all his people, and will

NOTES.

CHAP. VIII. V. 1, 2. The feast of trumpets was observed on the first day of the seventh month; and the people assembled to celebrate it though not explicitly required. It is probable that Nehemiah, having formed a plan for their instruction from the law, called upon them by their early attendance to concur in it. Doubtless the appointed sacrifices were offered, (Marg. Ref.) but the courts of the temple not being so spacious or convenient, the congregation assembled in a broad street of the city, to hear the law read and expounded: and not only the women, but even the children who were capable of understanding, attended. Accordingly Ezra the priest, being a learned and ready scribe, having long been bestowing much labour on the sacred Scriptures, and preparing correct copies of them, was called on to take the lead in this service: and though it does not appear that the measure originated with him, he yet most cordially concurred in it. Some conjecture that he had been at Babylon during the late events, in which he is not mentioned; and that he had lately returned; but perhaps he had been privately occupied in his own line for the good of his people, and was well satisfied to leave public affairs entirely to Nehemiah.

V. 3. The reading and expounding continued about six hours: and as most of the people seem to have stood in the open air all the time, it appears that they were not soon wearied: for indeed "the ears of all the people were unto the book of the law," fixed upon it with profound attention.

V. 4. Beside, &c. Some conjecture that these persons being priests or Levites, under Ezra's direction, assisted by turns in the service, to prevent his being worn down with it: but others think, that they only showed their concurrence, by standing on his right hand and on his left: or that they were thus preparing for the same service on future occasions.

V. 5, 6. Ezra having solemnly opened the sacred volume, before he began to read "blessed the LORD the great God:" he gave him thanks for that good gift and for all his mercies; he adored his great and glorious Majesty, and probably he craved his blessing on the service before him. To this the people gave a cordial and repeated assent; and, prostrating themselves on the ground, added their most solemn worship. This was an excellent preparation for a due regard to the sacred Scriptures.

V. 7. The persons mentioned in this verse, must not be confounded with those who stood by Ezra in his pulpit or tower: for no more than one of the same names occurs in both places; and, no doubt, in that instance, different men of the same name were meant. These were most, if not all, priests and Levites, (Marg. Ref.) and as they "caused the people to understand the law," and were not in the pulpit with Ezra; and as it can hardly be supposed that he merely read, and that they expounded what he read, it is not unlikely that they had separate audiences in different places, where they read and expounded the law, as Ezra did in the station assigned him: for one man's voice could not reach so great a multitude. Perhaps different orders and descriptions of persons formed separate circles: and therefore it is added, that "the people stood in their place," as it had been appointed to each of them.

V. 8. It is here said that they read, &c.; which confirms the preceding supposition, there being evidently more than one reader. The persons engaged in this service, read the text distinctly, and then gave the interpretation; thus the meaning was declared to the people, with all plainness, and application to their present circumstances and conduct, for their conviction and instruction. This seems the obvious meaning of the passage: but many learned men suppose, that the Jews had forgotten the Hebrew during the captivity; and that the expositors merely rendered what was read into Chaldee. 'But if this were true, why did the prophets write in Hebrew after their return from captivity? And this very book shows the contrary, (xiii. 23, 24.) where the Jews' language appears to have been spoken by the people. Nor is the custom of reading the targum, (or Chaldee version) after the law very ancient.' (Bp. Patrick.)

V. 9. The people, when the law of God was read and explained to them, were convinced of their own guilt and danger; and, with tender consciences and broken hearts, mourned for their transgressions. This was indeed a proper effect of that ordinance: but as it was a holy festival, which the Lord would have kept with joy and gladness; they were instructed by their teachers to repress their grief, and to turn their thoughts to the mercy of God, and to hope and rejoice in him.

V. 10. After the former part of the day had been spent in the ordinances of religion, the people were allowed, and even required, (it is likely, by a public notice from Nehemiah, enforced by the priests and Levites,) to spend the remainder in cheerful feasting, as a representation of the believer's joy in the service of his gracious God. Probably peace-offerings had been offered, and they were now called to feast together upon them: and might lawfully drink the sweet or rich wines which their vineyards produced, in as liberal a manner as consisted with temperance. But then they must remember to send portions to those for whom nothing had been prepared; to the poor, the stranger, the fatherless, and the widow. For this would distinguish their religious feasting from the sensual indulgence of carnal men, and complete the due solemnization of the holy day. They were also again reminded not to indulge grief on the present festival; "for the joy of the Lord was their strength." A grateful adoring recollection of his late mercies, and his ancient distinguished favours to the nation, and powerful interposition in their behalf; with cheerful meditation on his promises and perfections, inspiring confidence, love, and zeal, and leading them to abound in joyful praises and thanksgivings, would fortify their souls to meet the dangers, encounter the difficulties, resist the temptations, and perform the duties, which still lay before them. Whereas indulged sorrow would induce desponding fear, enfeeble their resolutions, and unfit them for labours, trials, and conflicts.

V. 12. The people had not only understood from the law the will of God and their own sinfulness, but they had learned, in some degree, the grounds of holy rejoicing: and having begun by sowing in tears, they soon were enabled to reap in joy.

V. 13. This was no festival; but having profited from the word the day before, the people were desirous to be further instructed: and the chief of the fathers, priests, and Levites, were the most forward to request Ezra to favour them with an exposition of some other part of the law, being convinced of his superior knowledge in it. Hence it appears, that he instructed even those who assisted in teaching the people.

It is evident that this and the other solemn feasts were totally neglected at some times, and for a long while together: yet we in a few instances read of the feast of tabernacles being kept; and must therefore understand these words, of the exactness, fervency, unanimity, and joyfulness, with which it was at this time celebrated. (Marg. Ref.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—8.

Pious men of different dispositions may serve the church in their several ways. The studious may, as it were, prepare materials with which the active may work: and the active may make way for the studious, to bring forth their treasures for public use. They ought therefore reciprocally to assist each other, and to welcome such assistance, without envy, competition, or prejudice. The public reading, expounding, and preaching of God's word, has in all ages been the grand method of promoting true religion: they, therefore, who are eminently capable of this service, should be called forth from obscurity and retirement, and excited to abound in it; all of every age, sex, or rank, who are capable of understanding, ought to be assembled to attend, and to "give earnest heed to the things which they hear;" they who are in reputation, should set an example of diligent attendance; and even teachers should be "swift to hear" other ministers, as they have opportunity, that they may become more competent for the work.—When the value of the Scriptures and of the soul is properly understood; and when we are earnestly engaged, and can relish heavenly pursuits, we shall not soon be weary of divine ordinances. Short sermons, therefore, or tired hearers, prove a very low state of religion: for facts demonstrate that where the word of God is precious, even inconvenient situations and uneasy postures will be patiently endured: and when ministers, who are themselves in earnest, perceive the people thirsting for instruction and drinking it in, they will be encouraged to proceed, and to preach as much and as often as required, whilst God gives them health for the work. Reading and preaching should be attended with solemn worship: the perfections of our God are worthy of all adoration; his mercies call for our grateful acknowledgment; and a sense of our own wants and unworthiness, love to his people, compassion for sinners, and regard to all orders of mankind, where they prevail, will dictate many prayers and supplications. In these services one person must speak, but all should join in their hearts, and express their solemn and cordial assent. We cannot too humbly or reverently worship the LORD, the great God: yet, blessed be his name, we may call him Father, in filial confidence and hope. Whenever we open the sacred volume, we should bless the Lord for that precious gift, and proceed to peruse it, with solemn submission to his teaching and authority. Ministers should endeavour to make it evident to every one, that they preach according to these sacred oracles, producing clear scriptural warrant for all their doctrine, reading the word distinctly, diligently causing the people to understand it by familiar explanations and illustrations, and applying it in the most plain and simple manner to their hearts and consciences.

V. 9—18.

The divine law, when faithfully unfolded in its extensive demands and righteous sanction, is generally made successful by the Holy Spirit, in bringing the stout, hard, and proud hearts of sinners to tremble, to melt into godly sorrow, and to become abased before God: for it pierces the conscience, fills the soul with dismay, and thus prepares for the sweet consolations of the gospel, by which is the knowledge of salvation, through the remission of sins. Thus the broken heart is bound up, and the sinner learns to rejoice in God our Saviour. Both godly sorrow and holy joy are profitable, and beautiful in their season: and it is peculiarly desirable to have all our passions regulated according to the will of God, and the duty of the present occasion. They who mourn for sin, should be comforted, instructed, and directed to rejoice in the Lord.

NOW in the ^a twenty and fourth day ^b of this month, the children of Israel were assembled with ^c fasting, and

This they have abundant reason to do, however many their sins have been, when they humbly come to trust in his mercy. His salvation is perfectly free; the provisions of his grace are plenteous; his righteousness is for ever; his ways are pleasantness; his protection sure; his consolations strong; and hope in his mercy and of his glory “maketh not ashamed, when his love is shed abroad in our hearts “by the Holy Ghost.” Joy in God, if genuine, adds strength and courage to the soul for every duty, and for every trial; it inspires resolution for service, and vigour in resisting temptation; it satisfies, and sanctifies, and enlarges the heart to cheerful obedience, and in love to our brethren: Indeed that joy is a mere counterfeit, which has not these effects; and they are enemies to their own sanctification, who always indulge sorrow even for sin, and put from them those consolations which are tendered to them by the word and Spirit of God. It is consistent with true godliness, cheerfully and moderately to use the comforts of Providence, when they are received with thanksgiving, and sanctified by the word of God and prayer, and by liberally communicating to the poor and needy. But they who “eat the fat and drink the sweet,” but send no portion, or but little, to those for whom nothing is prepared, have not this sanctified enjoyment of their abundance. This especially distinguishes a Christian feast from the revelings and banquetings which are ranked by the apostle with abominable idolatries. (1 Peter iv. 3.) Whatever calls a believer to rejoice, should excite him to abound in thanksgivings to God and liberality to the poor. But his joy will not so much arise from worldly prosperity or indulgence, as from having understood the words of God, and from perceiving that sinners may hope in his mercy and in the prospect of eternal glory. They who have profited by the preached word, will be glad of an opportunity of hearing it on any day, as far as consistent with other duties: and when the people are so disposed, the minister is called to be “instant in season and out of season.” Some portions of Scripture are more suitable to the circumstances of our congregations than others would be, especially when they remind them of present duty. For even true Christians neglect many things through ignorance and forgetfulness, and for want of particular instructions. But it is beautiful, when they no sooner hear the command of God, than they prepare for obedience; when attending on the word excites an appetite after it; and when the ordinances afford great gladness to their souls. Yet, alas! how little have the commandments and institutions of our God been hitherto observed, even in his professing church! So that when inwith sackclothes, and ^a earth upon them.

2 And ^a the seed of Israel separated themselves from all ^{*} strangers, and stood and ^f confessed their sins, and the iniquities of their fathers.

3 And ^a they stood up in their place, and read in the book of the law of the LORD their God, ^b one fourth part of the day; and another fourth part they confessed, and worshipped the LORD their God.

dividuals, or collective bodies, come near the standard of his word, in the power of godliness, they become men wondered at: But though none, from age to age, or through whole nations of professed Christians, have ever served God, as some small company may aim to do: yet if these be evidently obeying the plain meaning of Scripture, they ought not to be censured as singular, precise, or affected; but to be commended and imitated. True religion will render us strangers and pilgrims upon earth: and they who refuse conformity to the world, and have their conversation in heaven, and their joy in the Lord, must appear strange and uncouth in the eyes of the servants of that other master, who “worketh in all the children of “disobedience.”

NOTES.

CHAP. IX. V. 1. No doubt the day of atonement, on the tenth day of the seventh month, had been duly observed: and the feast of tabernacles lasted from the fifteenth to the twenty-second day of it: and then, one day having intervened, the people kept a solemn fast, with every customary expression of godly sorrow and humiliation. This seems to have been done, not only by the authority of the governor, but by the general approbation of the people; who, by hearing the law read and expounded, had discovered their own numerous and heinous transgressions, with those of their fathers and nation in all preceding ages: and it was intended as an introduction to their solemn covenanting with God, as afterwards recorded.

V. 2. Before the appointed fast began, the Israelites carefully separated from among them those strangers or Gentiles, who either by marriage or amity were intermingled with them. This was intended as a preparation for the solemn observance: for it seems the people had again intermarried with the surrounding nations, after Ezra had separated them from their heathen wives.

V. 3. The persons afterwards mentioned stood up to perform the services of the day; and they spent one fourth of it in reading the law, (probably expounding it also, as in the former instances,) and one fourth in confessing their sins and in other acts of solemn worship. Some think that six hours, (a fourth part of the twenty-four,) were at once spent in each of these sacred duties. Others suppose that they read the law, and confessed, (that is, praised God,) interchangeably. For in one fourth part of the day, from the first hour to the third, they did the one; and from thence to the sixth hour, (that is, till twelve o'clock,) they did the other. Then they began the former again, till the ninth hour; and from thence to the evening they ‘spent their time in the other!’ (Bp. Patrick.) But perhaps the three hours, previous to the offering of the morning-sacrifice, were assigned for the people to prepare themselves and their families for the public solemnity; and the three hours, after the evening-sacrifice, for their consenting to and sealing the covenant, and the improvement of what they had heard, by meditation, pious converse, and devotion: for on solemn fasts it was customary for the Jews to take no food till after sun-set. At least, however, the public services of the day continued six hours without intermission.

V. 4. It is probable that these Levites were placed at proper distances, (so as not to interfere with each other, when they “cried with a loud voice unto the LORD their God;”) upon pulpits or scaffolds erected for that purpose, with distinct auditories around them.

V. 5. Eight Levites are mentioned both in this verse and the preceding, and five of the names are the same: it may therefore be supposed, that the same persons are intended, of whom some were known by different names.—Perhaps the people were prostrate on the ground, or kneeling, while they humbly craved mercy from God, each for himself and for his people: but they were called upon to stand up, when the public worship began, and to bless and praise God for ever and ever, or as long as they had any being. He indeed is exalted above all blessing and “praise.” His essential glory is incomprehensible and infinite; so that the most sublime adorations of the highest created beings must fall unspeakably below his majesty and excellency. Yet he accepts their praises, when they worship him according to their capacities. Nay, he delights in the feeble praises and blessings of sinners, when they come before him in humble faith and cordial grateful love; and counts himself glorified by them, though they are not only defective, but also defiled!

V. 7. ‘Here follows a compendious history of the affairs of the Hebrew nation, in this confession of God’s benefits and of their ingratitude; which Nehemiah and Ezra, it is likely, composed in the form of a prayer, and delivered it to the Levites, whom they ordered to speak it distinctly before the whole congregation, from their several parts of the assembly, that they might be heard.’ (Bp. Patrick.) But, as at least three hours were employed in this part of the service, vastly more must have been spoken than is here written; which seems to have been a kind of compendium or directory to those who officiated, that all might be evidently of one mind; on the several parts of which each of them enlarged according to his ability.

V. 8. The Lord tried the faith of Abraham on many occasions; especially when he commanded him to offer up Isaac: but “he found his heart faithful.” Abraham stood every trial, and was approved. God also showed himself righteous towards Abraham and his posterity; both in faithfully performing his covenant-engagements, and in justly punishing their cruel and haughty oppressors. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 13. God spake the law of ten commandments from heaven, in respect of its heavenly original, as distinguished from the statutes of earthly lawgivers. Or the word heaven may mean the higher regions of the air. The moral law is right, true, and good: grounded upon eternal truth, resulting from the nature of God and man, and our relations to him and to each other; and forming the standard of excellency and the rule of felicity. The judgments given to Israel were more consistent with the true difference betwixt right and wrong, and the relative proportion of crimes and punishments, than the municipal laws of any other country have been: and the ritual law prefigured the true way of a sinner's justification, sanctification, and eternal life.

V. 14. By the observance of the sabbath, the Israelites were distinguished as the worshippers of the great Creator, who had also been their Deliverer from Egyptian bondage: and in this holy day they enjoyed a most important means of promoting true religion in their own hearts and in their families. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 15-17. (Notes, Num. xiii. xiv.)

V. 20. Thy good Spirit. The Spirit of prophecy, in Moses, Joshua, the seventy elders, and the subsequent prophets, both instructed the Israelites by their ministry, and testified against them when rebellious. (30.) The example, conversation, and exertions of those who partook of his sanctifying influences, tended to reform the nation: and no doubt the Spirit of God, by his convictions, powerfully excited in the consciences of the unconverted a sense of guilt and dread of punishment; and in other ways strove with them. But in all these respects they resisted the Holy Ghost. (Marg. Ref.) The unspeakable condescension and compassion of the blessed Spirit of God, in his operations upon the polluted souls of sinful men, as well as the tendency of those operations, are strongly marked in the words, "thy good Spirit."

V. 22. Corners. That is, into all the corners of the promised land from which the old inhabitants had been driven. Some expositors think, that the situation of Canaan, as favourable to Israel's separation from other nations, being divided by seas, mountains, and deserts, from the most flourishing kingdoms in the world, was denoted by this expression. And indeed it is observable, that Jerusalem, which God chose for the metropolis of his people, was situated at a distance from the sea, and from all navigable rivers; and therefore could not become a place of extensive commerce. Others however suppose, that the dispossessed nations are meant, who were driven into corners. Heshbon being the city of Sihon, the words should be rendered, "even the land of the king of Heshbon."

from what it had been under their own kings, and in the days of their prosperity. God had for their sins set over them the kings of Persia, who exacted from them heavy taxes, and who had their property, liberty, and lives entirely in their power. It was very distressing for the worshippers of God, to be in slavery to the worshippers of dumb idols: and though they had no intention of revolting from the kings of Persia, who allowed them to live according to their own laws: yet they hoped, that upon their deep repentance, and more entire return to God, he would more effectually deliver them from captivity and bondage, and restore them in due season to their former prosperity. (Marg. Ref. Notes, Ezra ix. Ps. lxxviii. cv. cvi. Dan. ix.)

V. 38. A sure, &c. This solemn covenanting with God seems to have been the object that Nehemiah and Ezra, and other leading men, aimed at, in all these instructions and religious observances.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—6.

The diligent study of God's word will more and more show us both our own sinfulness, and the plenteousness of his salvation, and thus alternately call us to mourn for sin, and to rejoice in him. Seasons of comfort should remind us of his condescending goodness, and so lead us to deeper self-abasement on account of our crimes against him: and thus joyful feasts and solemn fasts may properly succeed, and prepare our hearts for each other. Our sorrow and humiliation for sin must be evidenced to be genuine by separation from it, and from every occasion or temptation to it. Every discovery of the truth and will of God should endear to us his sacred word, and render us more unwearied in our attendance on it and on his worship. A few hours, or even occasionally a whole day, cannot be too long to spend in those exercises and meditations, which are preparations for heaven, and anticipations of its sacred joys: yet, alas, we are most of us sooner weary in the courts of the Lord, than the trifler is at his diversions, or even the labourer at his work! Our God knoweth our thoughts before we speak, and mental prayer may suit our secret intercourse with him: but they who address him in public, should speak audibly and with animation, that the people may hear and be affected: and if, on some occasions, "they cry with a loud voice "unto the LORD their God," or be more copious than usual, they cannot be censured, without involving those who are commended in the sacred Scriptures. Whether we feast and rejoice, or fast and mourn for sin, we should be ready to bless and praise the Lord our God, both for his eternal excellencies, for his goodness to us as our Creator, and the sole author of all our temporal comforts; and above all, as the God of salvation, for the wonders he hath done for his church of redeemed sinners from the beginning hitherto.

V. 7—31.

In reviewing this abstract of the Lord's conduct towards Israel, as a people, from the choice and call of Abraham to the days of Nehemiah, we perceive a continued display of his power, wisdom, truth, and love, requited by persevering ingratitude, and perverse disobedience. All their distinguishing advantages originated from his choice of them, and his gracious promises, which he most faithfully performed. But whilst surrounded with the riches of his bounty, and the demonstrations of his power and presence; whilst his holy law yet sounded in their ears, Sinai's fiery top was before their eyes, and they were guided, guarded, sustained, and instructed by miracles; they rebelled against God, set up idols, attempted to return to Egypt, and rushed vehemently into the most daring provocations! Yet he did not destroy them; he withdrew not his mercies from them; he was ever ready to hear their prayers, to pardon their sins, and to do them good: though they still continued their ingratitude, their murmurings, and provocations. The dealings of the Lord toward them, as a nation, in their warnings, corrections, and deliverances, throughout the whole history; and their abuse of his goodness, relapses into idolatry, neglect of his worship, contempt and persecution of his prophets, and other enormities, tended only to show the riches of his goodness, forbearance, and long-suffering; and the hardness of their impenitent hearts. And even when at length justice demanded that they should be given up into the hands of their enemies, and their temple, city, and country desolated; his tender mercy prevented him from utterly casting them off! Their miseries had been great and terrible; but the Lord was just in all that he had done: yet it was of his mercies that they were not consumed, and that a remnant had been brought back to their own land, who soon began to show the same spirit of ingratitude and disobedience. And is not their conduct a specimen of human nature? Our land, for instance, hath for ages been favoured with deliverances, opportunities, and benefits, little, if at all, inferior to those vouchsafed Israel! and have we not copied their ingratitude, rebellion, and iniquity? Oh, may a general reformation, whilst yet we are spared, prevent our being given up into the hands of foreign conquerors, or domestic oppressors!

But especially we should study our own history. Let us look back to the time when we received our being, as rational creatures, from the goodness and power of the Lord; let us recollect the distinguishing advantages of our infancy and childhood: then let us ask ourselves, what were our first returns to our kind Friend and Benefactor? what were our first thoughts, words, and works? As our faculties began to unfold, revolving years brought with them recent comforts and advantages: and did they not witness increasing perverseness, ingratitude, and ungodliness? Let us divide our lives past into distinct periods, and carefully investigate the mercies and the transgressions of each, until we have brought down the inquiry to the present hour: praying the Holy Spirit to assist our recollection: to enable us to form a proper estimate of God's dealings with us, and our behaviour towards him; and to deduce proper inferences from the whole, with suitable affections: and if prejudice, ignorance, or self-flattery do not blind our minds, we shall certainly see abundant cause for deep humiliation and for admiring gratitude; and to acknowledge, that all our sufferings have been justly merited, all our comforts mercifully bestowed. Besides the temporal provision which we have from the Lord's bounty, though not by miracle, we are favoured with means and opportunities of becoming wise unto salvation, even beyond what Israel enjoyed in their most favoured times. We have the sacred oracles, now completed and ever at hand, to give us light, and to show us the way in which we should go. We have the Gospel preached among us, and the holy sabbaths and ordinances of our God: but have we never neglected, profaned, and despised them? We have not been without salutary chastisements, and merciful deliverances, perhaps in answer to prayer; but we requited them by returning into sin! We have had not only the testimony of God's servants, but the strivings of his good Spirit: but have we never hated or despised the one, and quenched the other? nay, we are especially under the ministration of the Spirit; yet perhaps have neglected to pray for his gracious influences, and derided those who did! And have not we proudly cast off the authority of God's law; and as proudly endeavoured to justify ourselves before him? This I say was the case with us once, perhaps is still so with some who read these observations. Yet, whilst others have been cut off, we are spared! May this review of the Lord's mercies and our sins bring us to true repentance, and induce us to condemn ourselves, as having imitated and vindicated all the transgressors who have gone before us: may it bring us to submit to the Lord's righteousness, to accept of his salvation, and to set our seal to his new covenant of mercy and grace; that "being delivered from all our enemies, we may serve him in righteousness before him," the remainder of our days.

Even, if by the Lord's choice of us, and his grace given to us, we have on the whole been made and found faithful to him; and if his covenant hath been ratified to us with all its precious promises, we shall not only have cause to adore him for these inestimable mercies, and for his Son Jesus Christ as the foundation of them all, but we shall, upon every review, see cause to admire his present patience and gentleness, and to lament our ingratitude and disobedience. We have been delivered from a worse oppression than that of the Egyptian tyrant, and by a far more wonderful exertion of Almighty power and love. We are guided by a better light, sheltered by a more glorious protection, and favoured with stronger consolations, than Israel of old. We feed upon "the Bread of life, which came down from heaven, to give life unto the world:" we drink the Waters which flow from the Rock of ages who was smitten for us; we are clothed with the robe of righteousness and salvation; our feet are shod with the preparation of the Gospel of peace; and the good Spirit of God is not only our condescending Instructor and Sanctifier, but our Comforter also, who deigns to make our hearts his temple; and we possess the hope and earnest of everlasting glory. But, whilst we rejoice in the Lord's great goodness to us, what requital do we make? We are indeed kept from habitual and gross disobedience: but we are conscious how often we are setting up our idols, and in heart returning to our bondage: how often we forget him, grieve his holy Spirit, and neglect his service: and how often we are kept from still greater revolts by no higher motives than the terror of his judgments, and the smart of his salutary chastisements, which we soon forget, when he hath mercifully removed them! Were he not slow to anger, and ready to pardon, he would have cast us off long ago. But our heavenly Advocate still pleads, and we are spared; and his mercies and our privileges are continued to us!

On every review of this kind we shall find cause to lie down ashamed before God, praising his great goodness, and confessing our great unworthiness. Let us then thank him for his merciful corrections, as well as his consolations: let us renew our acceptance of his salvation, and ratification of his covenant: let us beg of him to deliver us from all our other lords, that we may serve him more entirely. And let us frequently meditate on these subjects, that we may be preserved humble, thankful, and watchful; as well as be prepared for communion with him in every sacred ordinance. It behoves all men to reflect seriously and frequently on the greatness, justice, and goodness of the Lord: to consider the terrible power of his indignation, and the infinite value of his favour. And they should remember, that pride, obstinacy, and impenitence, are the sins which ruin the soul; and that no former crimes can condemn the penitent believer. Let then the sinner trust in the mercy of Him who is a God of pardons, and ready to forgive: let the backslider repent and return to him: let the believer walk humbly with him: let the prosperous fear abusing the Lord's goodness: let the afflicted be warned to seek deliverance from the wrath to come. Let us ever remember that all our miseries are the effect of sin, and that they are all less than we deserve, though hard for us to bear; let us then pray to be delivered from the bitter pains of eternal death; and let us not forget to entreat the Lord to deliver his church from all the oppression of the enemy, and to establish it in the beauty of holiness.

service. Such transactions were sometimes ratified with sacrifices, solemn oaths, and other expressions of the most entire consent to them : but this is the first instance met with of a covenant drawn up in writing, and ratified by the names and seals of the persons who consented to it. No doubt this was devised to render the transaction more affecting : and that the deed might remain as a durable testimony against those who violated it : the explicit ratification thus given would render the persons concerned more sensible of their obligations, and more afraid of transgression ; it would fortify them against temptation, preserve them from forgetfulness, and be a constant argument for them to urge in cautioning, exhorting, or reproving each other. The same uses may be made of those professions, and of that consent to the new covenant, which are virtually made in baptism, whether personal or that of our children ; and in the Lord's supper ; when those ordinances are duly explained and understood, administered and attended on. To this covenant the chief persons alone set their names and seals ; and Nehemiah, the governor, first : and perhaps Zidkijah was one of the princes, but no other name is explicitly mentioned of that order.

V. 2—8. It is observable that Eliashib, the high-priest, is not found among those who sealed the covenant. And it is probable that neither he nor his sons favoured the measure. (xlii. 4.) But it is more surprising that the name of Ezra is wanting. There is no reason to think he was absent ; for he was at Jerusalem both before and after this transaction : perhaps he was confined by sickness or infirmity ; or the measure so entirely originated with him, and he had bestowed so much pains in drawing up the covenant, and inducing others to consent to it, that his further ratification of it was deemed superfluous.

V. 9—17. Most, if not all, of the Levites, that led the public devotions, set their seal to the covenant ; which may be admitted as a probable indication, that they were earnestly and zealously engaged in that service. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 18—27. Many of the names here mentioned, are found among those who returned with Zerubbabel, about ninety years before : so that, either the same names were preserved in the several families ; or the principal descendants of these persons, when in general favourable to the measure, subscribed their family-name, that is, the name of that ancestor, by relation to whom they were commonly distinguished. (Luke i. 61.)

V. 28. All they, &c. It is probable, that these were the proselytes who, having been circumcised, separated from their idolatrous connexions, and kept the law of Moses, and thus were numbered amongst the native Jews.

V. 29. By the nobles, in this place, the superior persons, priests, or Levites, are evidently meant. The body of the people, who were old enough to be capable of knowing what was intended, assembled together, and signified, by some appointed token, their consent to the covenant as in the presence of God, and under the solemn obligation of an oath ; and to an awful curse, which was denounced against such as violated these obligations. They engaged in general to obey the whole law of Moses ; and some instances were specified, in which they had been remarkably guilty, or which were peculiarly ensnaring.

on his gracious assistance: when these transactions have indeed taken place in secret, between God and our souls; our public sealing and ratifying the covenant, at the Lord's table, or in any other solemn way, will be honourable to God, edifying to his people, and encouraging to ourselves; and we may trust in the Lord to enable us to fulfil the engagements with acceptance. But where this preparation of heart is wanting, such public engagements will be mere hypocrisy. This detestable evil will intrude in all great revivals of religion, after every possible precaution; yet the hypocrites must be left to the judgment of a heart-searching God. But men should be warned, that they, who in baptism, or at the Lord's table, or when admitted into the ministry, or in any other way, engage for what they do not intend, or afterwards take no care to perform, bring themselves under an additional and most awful curse: as do all who trifle with solemn oaths, vows, or sacramental engagements of any kind; and all who despise, oppose, or abuse the salvation of the Gospel. Every one, capable of understanding, is alike required to obey God's law; all need the mercy and grace of the gospel; all therefore should be exhorted and commanded to set their seals to the covenant of God: but they who have the pre-eminence in society, or take the lead in religious exercises, ought to set the example; and they who are remarkably zealous to reform others, should be as remarkably zealous in every good work. The influence and example of the great will always have a powerful effect upon their inferiors: their distinction is truly honourable, when in following and cleaving to them, others follow and cleave to the Lord: and the Christian equality of the common people, as brethren to believing nobles and rulers, will increase the honour and respect that they will render to them.

V. 30—39.

We are not sincere in covenanting with God, except we aim to obey all his commandments: for if we allow ourselves in violating one of them habitually, it is evident that we have not truly repented of our former transgressions in that particular; that we have never sought forgiveness of them in a due manner; that we do not desire the sanctifying Spirit of Christ, to mortify that peculiar sinful propensity: and consequently that we are not born of God, nor interested in the righteousness and atonement of Christ. —But real believers place the strongest guard where there is the greatest danger; and use every means of avoiding and subduing those sins which have the most foiled and ensnared them. Separation from intimate connexions with ungodly persons, and conscientious hallowing of the Lord's day, are peculiarly attended to by them. They will not infringe upon the sacred rest, and they will show a marked disapprobation of those who do: they will remove occasions of transgression, and previously arrange every thing, as may best promote the useful observance of that holy day. Their attention to the ordinances of God will connect with justice to all men, and mercy to those who need it. They will not exact from their brethren, when it would distress them; but they will trust the Lord to repay what they thus lose or expend. Though they be poor or burdened, they will find a little to spare for pious or charitable uses; that little will be accepted; and coming from great numbers, will form large funds for useful purposes. As the ordinances of God are the appointed means of sustenance to our souls, the believer should not grudge the expense of them. Even the poor will part with their money for bread; yet most men leave their souls to starve! But the covenanted servant of God honours him with his substance and with the first fruits of his increase, and that brings a blessing upon the rest: nor will he defraud or withhold from the ministers, who labour in the word and doctrine, his proportion of a suitable maintenance. In short, we must render to God, to the king, to magistrates, superiors, equals, inferiors, relatives, the poor, and all men, that which is due unto them, according to the precepts of God's word; if we would evidence ourselves the true disciples of Christ, and adorn the doctrine of God our Saviour: and in these things we must persevere, exhorting one another "not to forsake the house of our God," but to walk before him in all his ordinances and commandments blameless.

NOTES.

CHAP. XI. V. 1, 2. Jerusalem at this time was not a place of trade, by which men could acquire wealth: the houses in general were not built: the adversaries of the Jews were peculiarly hostile to that city, both as the capital of the people whose returning prosperity they envied, and the place of the holy worship they hated: and the cities of Judah, and other situations in the country, afforded a fairer prospect of living in peace and of growing rich. It was therefore deemed a necessary policy, to replenish Jerusalem, for the re-establishment of the Jews as a distinct nation; and for the honour of the temple, and the protection of the priests and worshippers from the invasion of their enemies. It was "the holy city," as chosen, separated, and sanctified of God, for his immediate presence and instituted worship; as a type of Christ and even of heaven; and as the place where the greatest advantages of becoming holy were enjoyed: yet the Jews in general had not sufficient zeal or desire after spiritual improvement, to venture the consequences of removing thither. Some indeed willingly offered themselves to dwell there; whom their brethren commended, thanked, and prayed for, though they would not imitate. The rulers fixed their residence there, that the courts of justice, and the business connected with public affairs, might draw others: and in addition to these inhabitants, one family in ten was expressly required to remove to Jerusalem; the selection of which was by lot referred to the determination of God. 'They cast lots, that among ten men, it might be known whom God chose to come thither: and the lot falling by divine appointment upon such a person rather than on another, no doubt he removed the more contentedly to this city.' (Bp. Patrick.)

V. 3. Israel, in this verse, seems to mean those of the ten tribes, who went up with the Jews. These were not required to dwell at Jerusalem, but inhabited the cities and villages allotted to them. The priests, Levites, Nethinims, and children of Solomon's servants likewise, were left at liberty when not attending at the temple. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 5, 6. Shiloni is supposed by some to mean Shelah, Judah's youngest, but only surviving son by Shuah, the Canaanitess. (Marg. Ref.) If this supposition be well grounded, his descendants seem to have been included in the four hundred threescore and eight valiant men of Perez, or Pharez; that being the principal branch of the tribe of Judah. Many or most of these men of Judah seem to have offered themselves willingly to dwell at Jerusalem, in order to defend it; and probably they were in general heads of families: yet the number from this principal tribe, appears to have been comparatively small. In the ninth chapter of the first of Chronicles, a larger number is stated; but it may be supposed, that the descendants of Zerah, (Judah's other son,) are also included, of whom no more than one is mentioned in this chapter. (24. Notes, 1 Chr. ix.)

V. 7—9. The greatest part of Jerusalem was situated within the lot of Benjamin; and, it is probable, the men of that tribe were most desirous of having it fully replenished. Nearly twice as many Benjamites, (we may suppose with their families,) dwelt there as of Judah. The number does not exactly agree with that in the ninth of the first of Chronicles; though there can be no reasonable doubt but the same events are intended: but at this distance of time it cannot be supposed that such trivial variations can in all cases be accounted for: though the reason of them might be very evident to contemporaries. From this time Jerusalem was progressively repeopled; so that it soon became very populous, and continued to be so, till destroyed by the Romans. Joel was the principal commander of the Benjamites in Jerusalem: and Judah, or Hodaviah, was his deputy, or the next in authority under him.

V. 11, 12. Eliashib was high-priest at this time, under whom it is probable Seraiah had the oversight of all the temple-service. Some think the captain of the temple held the same office. (Marg. Ref.) The eight hundred and twenty-two priests here mentioned, seemed to have willingly resided at Jerusalem; besides those who attended by rotation. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 16. The outward, &c. (Note, 1 Chron. xxvi. 29.) These persons seem to have had the charge of providing the sacrifices, and making all the other outward preparations for the worship, which the priests performed in the courts and in the sanctuary.

V. 17. The time of the morning and evening sacrifices were the principal hours of prayer to the Jews, who then resorted to the courts of the temple for their devotions.—These were, it seems, preceded by the solemn praises and thanksgivings, which the Levites rendered to the Lord with music and singing. Over this sacred service, Mattaniah, as precentor, stately presided; while the others here named, being descendants of Jeduthun, one of the chief singers in David's time, acted under his direction.

V. 19. Akkub and Talmon are numbered with the porters which came up with Zerubbabel, nearly a hundred years before the events here recorded. In this and a few other instances of the same kind, it must be supposed, either that the children were called by the names of their fathers; or that, having distinct names of their own, they were also honoured in their public characters by the names of their more illustrious ancestors.

V. 22, 23. The descendants of Asaph, (a chief singer in the time of David,) presided over some business relative to the temple, and its repairs; at those times when not employed in psalmody. And they were appointed to this service, because, it seems, the king of Persia allowed those employed in singing the praises of God a daily stipend, besides their maintenance as Levites.

V. 24. Pethahiah, a descendant of Judah by Zerah, probably was the king's commissioner, who received the tribute, made all payments from it, and managed all such matters, according to orders from the king. It was an advantage to the Jews to have one of their own nation in this post: and it may be supposed he was preferred to it, through Nehemiah's recommendation.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

It has in all ages been justly lamented, that men prefer their own ease and emolument to the public good; that even professed Christians too commonly “seek their own, and not the things of Jesus Christ;” and that but few have that attachment to holy places and holy things, as to renounce their secular pleasures for the sake of them. Yet surely, where opportunities of spiritual improvement most abound, and where Jesus the ruler of our holy city resides, there we should delight to dwell, in preference to all interests and connexions, and notwithstanding persecutions, tribulations, perils, and losses! Otherwise, where is our “meetness for the inheritance of the saints in light?” and how shall we be willing to depart hence, and be absent from the body, that we may be present with the Lord? For, to the carnally-minded the perfect holiness of heaven, of its inhabitants, its employments, and its pleasures, and especially of that God who there unveils his glory, would be proportionably more intolerable, than the feeble beginnings of holiness in his church on earth, which excite their disgust, their weariness, and aversion. The remnant that now willingly offer themselves to self-denying and perilous services, from love to the church and zeal for the glory of God, shall be marked with peculiar honour: and many will commend and wish them well, who, alas! have not courage to imitate them. Our habitations are allotted us by the Lord himself; and we should not be hasty in changing them, though they be in some respects incommodious, especially if convenient for attendance on divine ordinances. In every station in life we should study to be quiet, and to do our own business with diligence: and at all times to cast our cares on God, and make our requests known unto him, by prayer with thanksgiving. We cannot be so afflicted, as not to have cause for gratitude; nor so prosperous, as not to need to pray: these duties should therefore be always united. And to this the ministers ought to stir up the people, not only by their exhortations, but by their example likewise. As far as the Lord sees good, he makes even strangers to protect and provide for his servants. Let us then seek first his favour and his glory; let us study contentment, patience, and usefulness in our several stations; and wait in cheerful hope for an admission into the holy city of our God above.

NOTES.

CHAP. XII. V. 1—6. It is evident that Ezra here mentioned was not Ezra the scribe, but a priest of the same name, who came up to Jerusalem long before with Zerubbabel. Several of the names are the same with those of the priests who sealed the covenant; (Marg. Ref.) but different persons must be intended; and it is evident, the same names were preserved in their families.

V. 7. The chief of the priests seem to have been the heads of the courses established by David; with the next in succession to the high-priesthood, and the ruler or captain of the temple. Perhaps the twenty-four courses were not yet fully established.

V. 9. In their watches. Some of the Levites, in succession, seem to have sung the praises of God in the sanctuary, during the watches of the night.

V. 11. Jaddua is by most expositors supposed to have been high-priest in the time of Alexander the great, and to have met that haughty conqueror in his pontifical habit; in consequence of which Alexander greatly favoured the Jews. It is however evident, that he was high-priest long after the close of this book, for Jaddua then filled that high office; and as Darius the Persian is supposed to mean the last king of Persia, who was subdued by Alexander about a hundred years after the principal transactions recorded in this book; this verse, and the twenty-second, must of course have been added by another hand after the death of Nehemiah. (26.)

V. 27. Jerusalem was the holy city, and the wall was built under the immediate care of JEHOVAH: It was therefore proper that it should be dedicated to that God who was there worshipped, by solemn praises, thanksgivings, prayers, and sacrifices; and thus committed to his gracious protection.

V. 30. When the priests and Levites had prepared themselves by the appointed purifications, they proceeded to purify the people, the gates, and the wall; probably by the sprinkling of the water of purification, with suitable prayers and supplications. This implied, that they, and all they did, or even touched, were polluted by their sins, and unworthy of God's acceptance till purified in his appointed way.

V. 31—43. The princes and priests divided into two companies on the wall, Ezra going before the one, and Nehemiah after the other. Thus they marched in a row opposite ways, in the circuit of the wall, the priests sounding the sacred trumpets, the Levites playing upon instruments, and singing the praises of God, and all the people accompanying them on each side. When they met on the opposite side of the city, they marched in a body to the temple, and offered sacrifices and thank-offerings, with rejoicings: for God, by enabling them to rebuild and fortify the city, had made them to rejoice with great joy: so that the praises and acclamations of so large a multitude were heard at a great distance. Zechariah, (35) being descended from Asaph, of the line of Gershon, was no priest; and the word namely is improperly added. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 44—47. The attendance and behaviour of the priests and Levites, on this solemn occasion, seems to have greatly rejoiced the pious Jews: and therefore they were zealous to provide for them, that their incomes should be properly paid, and distributed by persons appointed for that purpose. Thus matters were settled, as they had been in the days of David and Solomon. Similar regulations had been made in the days of Zerubbabel; but they were completed and put upon a durable footing, in the time of Nehemiah.—The tithes were paid to the Levites, as sanctified to their use; and the tithe of them were by the Levites sanctified to the use of the priests. ‘The porters “kept the ward “of purification;” that is, duly observed the orders about ‘purification, in not suffering any unclean persons or ‘unclean thing to come into the house of God.’ (35.) (Bp. Patrick.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The Lord raises up a succession of worshippers from age to age, who honour him by their sacrifices of praise and thanksgiving; and who derived instruction and encouragement from the examples and actions of those that have long before entered into their rest. The believer should undertake nothing, which he does not dedicate to the Lord, by seeking his direction and assistance in it and blessing upon it; by designing his glory, and by giving praise for success in all things: and whatever he possesses he should commit to the Lord’s keeping and disposal, and use according to his will. But all that we sinners do must be purified by the blood of sprinkling, and by the grace of the Holy Spirit, or it cannot be acceptable unto God: and the whole church of God, which is the lot of his inheritance, and the object of his choice and delight, from the race of fallen Adam, must be thus purified and rendered holy unto the Lord. They, who would be instrumental in the conversion of sinners, and the sanctification of believers, must begin with themselves: and when we acknowledge God in all our ways, he will so prosper and comfort us, as often to cause us to rejoice with great joy.—If our families are trained up to join in the solemn worship of God, and in attendance on his word, we may hope that they will share our joys and privileges: and the prosperity of the church gladdens the hearts of all true believers. When their affections are thus lively, they will be disposed to love and rejoice in those ministers, who are instrumental to their comfort; and to care for their suitable provision. But it is the wisdom of ministers to mind their work, and not be too anxious about their interests; and then God will stir up the hearts of the people, to supply them in a comfortable and creditable manner. This they may receive with songs of praise and thanksgiving, and need not fear sanctifying a portion, even of their portion, to the immediate service of God and the support of his cause.

NOTES.

CHAP. XIII. V. 1—3. Some expositors think, that the events recorded in these verses, took place several years after those related in the former chapter, and that during a great part of the time Nehemiah had been absent, at the Persian court. But the introductory language seems rather to imply, that they occurred immediately: and indeed, it can hardly be supposed, that, when the gross abuses stated in the sequel prevailed, the public reading of the law at the temple was regularly kept up, and the people zealous to reduce it to practice. It is therefore more probable, that, before Nehemiah left Jerusalem, namely, just after the dedication of the wall, the law was publicly read and expounded to the congregation; when of Israel with bread and with water, but c hired Balaam against them, that he should curse them: howbeit d our God turned the curse into a blessing.

3 Now it came to pass, e when they had heard the law, f that they separated from Israel all g the mixed multitude.

4 And before this h Eliashib the priest, i having the oversight of the chamber of the house of our God, was j allied unto Tobiah;

6 But m in all this time was not I at Jerusalem: for in n the two and thirtieth year of Artaxerxes king of Babylon came I unto the king, and o after certain days * obtained I leave of the king.

the passage here referred to, coming in course, excited peculiar attention; and the people of their own accord, without compulsion, but by the concurrence of the magistrates, resolved to separate from the intimate society of the mixed multitude, especially of Ammonites and Moabites, according to the meaning of the law (Notes, Deut. xxiii. 2—5.) Whether intermarriages with those nations, even when fully proselyted, and with their descendants, was, or was not, intended in the law, many instances would doubtless occur, in which a separation would be required; for probably few, in comparison of those with whom alliances had been formed, were fully proselyted, or the descendants of such proselytes.—It is supposed, that from the days of Ezra and Nehemiah, synagogues were built in every part of the land, where God was publicly worshipped, and his word read, expounded, or preached; which produced very salutary effects. A copy of the Scriptures then extant, was placed in every synagogue; and the whole was divided into portions or lessons, for the several days when they were accustomed to assemble for that purpose: and probably the same became the general usage in the court of the temple.

V. 4. Eliashib had before this formed an alliance with Tobiah the Ammonite, but perhaps secretly, to escape censure. (Marg. Ref.) It does not appear that the high-priest, or his sons, were married to any of Tobiah's family; but he was confederated with, and related to, those that were: and his authority over the temple and all its buildings, enabled him to commit that scandalous profanation, which is next related. The word rendered chamber, seems to mean the out-buildings in general.

exes in the twentieth year of his reign; and this journey to court took place in his thirty-second year: so that twelve years had elapsed, concerning which we have little account. When Nehemiah was gone from Jerusalem, Eliashib seems to have invited Tobiah thither: and though all Moabites and Ammonites had been publicly excluded from the congregation, according to the law of God; yet the high-priest admitted this unproselyted Ammonite, who was as bitter an enemy to his people as Balak himself, even into the chambers of the temple; casting out thence the consecrated oblations to make room for him, and probably forming him a sumptuous apartment, by throwing many of them into one!—This was as great a contempt of God's law, a profanation of the temple, and disgrace of the priesthood, as could well be imagined.

V. 7—9. Nehemiah is generally supposed to have been absent from Jerusalem only one year: but the great abuses which prevailed at his return, favour the opinion of those who think that about five years intervened; and there is nothing in the text that militates against it: for the words rendered after certain days, or at the end of days, do not necessarily signify after one year, but may denote a longer time. (Dan. xii. 13.) At his return, he was greatly afflicted and displeased at what had taken place, and he soon exercised his authority, in the most decided manner, to clear the temple from such a profanation, and to purify the chambers, that they might be restored to their proper use. It is probable, that Eliashib was dead before Nehemiah returned; and Tobiah would not choose to appear at Jerusalem to see after his furniture.

V. 10—13. As the high-priest had ventured profanely to appropriate the chambers of the temple for the entertainment of an Ammonite, perhaps he had also sacrilegiously intercepted the revenues of the Levites for similar purposes: or the people were reluctant to pay their tithes, when so bad a use was made, or so little care taken of them. Thus the Levites were driven from their work, to get their living by cultivating the land, or by other secular employments; and the temple-service, especially the psalmody, was interrupted. The rulers, who had been left in trust, ought to have exerted their authority to prevent such mismanagement; but probably they had concurred in it, out of regard to their secular interests; and therefore Nehemiah called them to account for their misconduct. Malachi is supposed to have prophesied about this time, and he seems to refer to these abuses in several places. (Marg. Ref.) 'It is a great artifice of the devil, by his instruments, to defraud the ministers of religion of their necessary maintenance, that he may thereby abolish religion itself.' (Wolphius, in Bp. Patrick.) Nehemiah, however, not only recalled the Levites, but having, it seems, without difficulty, induced the people to bring their tithes, he placed the distribution of them in the hands of faithful men, in whom all parties reposed confidence.

V. 14. (Marg. Ref.) It is evident Nehemiah expected that the Lord would remember his good deeds, and vouchsafe them a gracious recompense, notwithstanding defects in them, and sin in him; after the same manner, as even the apostle Paul assures the Hebrews, that the Lord would not forget their work and labour of love; and not as claiming a reward of debt. But it is also worthy of notice, that these good deeds or kindnesses which he had done to the house of God, consisted in using his authority to protect the ministers of religion, from those who defrauded them of their maintenance. There have been times, when enriching the clergy beyond all bounds, and without requiring them to attend on their ministry, was thought the height of piety; but it may be questioned whether rulers may not at present, as well as for some past ages, run into the contrary extremes: and Nehemiah's firm and prudent conduct in this respect, might be imitated with good effect by Christian princes and rulers.

V. 15—18. It can hardly be supposed, that in the course of one year of Nehemiah's absence, such gross and open profanation of the sabbath should have been introduced. The Tyrians, as heathens not regarding the sabbath, tempted the Jews to break it by trading with them. The magistrates must have been shamefully negligent, in conniving at these abuses till they were become so notorious: and the nation seemed to be proceeding, in many respects, as their fathers had done, in provoking the wrath of God against them.

V. 19. Some of, &c. Nehemiah could place more dependence in this case on his own attendants, than on the porters appointed by the nobles of Judah: who probably countenanced this profanation, in order to indulge their luxury or their avarice.

V. 20—22. The merchants and dealers still hoped to find some opportunity of trading on the sabbath, either with the citizens or countrymen: but as they were trying to induce the Jews to break the law of God, and that of their rulers, Nehemiah solemnly assured them, that if they did not desist, he would proceed to inflict punishment on them. He also appointed the Levites to watch the gates, perhaps supposing they would be more regarded than his servants; and also, because he would have the watch continued, even if he should leave Jerusalem. This reformation seems to have produced very durable effects; for in the after ages of the Jewish church, they became exact even to superstition in observing the sabbath. Probably his other regulations were at last equally effectual: but we have no more canonical history concerning them.

Remember, &c. 'Nehemiah had besought God to remember his good deeds, (14.) but to show that he did not think there was any proper merit or worthiness in them, which required a reward as a debt in justice due to them, he here explains himself; and desires to be rewarded, or rather pardoned, out of God's free goodness, according to the greatness, or the multitude of his mercies.' V. 23—30. Some time must have elapsed after Nehemiah's departure from Jerusalem, before the children of these marriages could betray their origin by their speech; yet probably they were not contracted before that event, and the reform seems to have been made very soon after his return. This separation also evidently was diverse from that recorded before, (1—3:) for that was the effect of reading the law, and by voluntary consent; this by more vehement measures. When this zealous reformer found these undeniable proofs of the people's guilt, he began without delay to put a stop to the evil. He contended, or vehemently argued the matter, with those who were concerned; proving the criminality and fatal effects of such marriages from the Scriptures, in an unanswerable manner. He then denounced the awful curse of God upon such as persisted in disobedience, and perhaps excluded them from the congregation: he punished such as were refractory with immediate scourging, and put others of them under some disgraceful stigma: and made them all solemnly swear to separate from their heathen wives. Among the other examples of his impartial severity, he banished the grandson of Eliashib, who had married the daughter of Sanballat. (Lev. xxi. 7—15.) Josephus relates that this young man was named Menasseh, and that at his instance Sanballat and the Samaritans built their temple upon mount Gerizim, in opposition to that at Jerusalem; at which he officiated, in some measure according to the ritual appointments of Moses. Hence schism, emulation, and rancorous enmity between the two nations were perpetuated to future ages.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—13.

The public reading of the whole word of God, as far as it relates to our faith and practice, is of immense advantage, to true religion. Though we have heard many sermons, and have the Bible in our hands, few of us are acquainted with every part of it; and many live in violation of its injunctions, through ignorance or inattention. But when they who are well disposed hear the word of God condemn any part of their conduct, they are reminded to break off the sin, and to do the neglected duty. They who are unkind to the people of God, who attempt to afflict them, or who wish them evil, will be punished as his enemies; and he will turn their curses and malicious deeds into blessings to those who trust and obey him. Alas, how prone is human nature to evil! When the restraints of influence or authority are withdrawn, men break out into those excesses of which they seemed incapable; whilst the eye and authority of God are treated with atheistical disregard! They who have enjoyed the highest dignities in the visible church by divine right, have sometimes been equally distinguished by sacrilegious impiety; and have openly committed those crimes which the most profane of the laity would not have ventured on without hesitation and dismay! But if sacredness of character will not restrain men from setting a pernicious example; it should not shelter them from censure or condign punishment by the magistrate. As nobles have too generally, in every age and country, deemed themselves privileged to disregard the divine law, and many human institutions obligatory on others; magistrates and reformers need courage and resolution, as well as impartiality and integrity. Our grief for the sins we witness, should stimulate us to oppose them strenuously, according to the duty of our station, and induce us not to yield to unmanly despondency. It is not expedient that magistrates or ministers should be long absent from their respective charges: for one sinner will often take advantage of their absence, to destroy much good; and by example, insinuation, and influence, to subvert their most useful regulations, and to render their designs abortive. Few ministers will continue willing to labour under the pressure or the prospect of indigence; but most will turn themselves to more profitable occupations: so that depriving the clergy of a suitable maintenance forms one of Satan's projects for causing the house and ordinances of God to be forsaken. Pious magistrates should peculiarly attend to this: they should take care that the ministers of the Gospel be encouraged to labour in their proper places, and that a competent provision be made for them: nor are any, except men of approved fidelity, to be trusted in such concerns.

V. 14—31.

The due observance of the Lord's day forms an important object for the attention of those who would promote true godliness: and the Christian magistrate should take proper measures to prevent that sacred day being profaned by labour, merchandise, or the carrying on of those occupations which subserve the luxury and pride of life. And, as nobles too commonly set the example both of breaking God's commandments, and of disregarding royal edicts in this particular; they must first be contended with, and vigorously urged to do their duty. Persons, in the higher orders of society in general, little consider the effects of their misconduct: if they violate the holy day of God, others will assuredly imitate their impiety; and thus the flood-gates of ungodliness and wickedness will be thrown open, which must bring the wrath of God on guilty nations. Indeed the present state of unprincipled profligacy in these kingdoms, may be shown in great measure to originate from the relaxed sentiments which some time after the reformation began to prevail concerning the spending of the sabbath. And as these have gained ground, that holy day has gradually become more and more the time when the lower orders have been let loose to corrupt one another. It is also necessary to repeat the observation, that improper marriages have ensnared the wisest men, have always led to apostacies, and have tended to the ruin of succeeding generations. The children readily imbibe the principles of the infidel or ungodly parent, and soon forget the very language or appearance of piety; or substitute a corrupt religion in the stead of that which comes from God and leads to him. Mothers likewise have a vast share in forming the manners of mankind; as the care of children in their tender years is almost wholly committed to them. It is therefore of great consequence to society, that females should be educated with a view to this most important employment, and qualified for the discharge of their duty in it. Every wise man, in contracting marriage, should consider whether the object of his choice would be a proper person to intrust with his children's tuition: and every mother should consider, that this is the most important part of her charge, and most of all calls for assiduity, prudence, and circumspection. In opposing fashionable and reputable vices; conclusive arguments, vehement expostulations, apposite examples, awful declarations of the wrath of God, and solemn engagements, may have the proper effect upon some: but the magistrate must often use more vigorous measures. He must disgrace, punish, and chase away, the ringleaders in iniquity, without respect of persons or families: and severity to a few will prove mercy to many. But in every thing the word of God must be our rule; the love and fear of God our principle; and his glory, in the prosperity of his cause, and the welfare of his people, our great object. Whilst we labour in this manner, we must expect the enmity and opposition of a wicked world: but we may go on with confidence in the spirit of faith and prayer. We may humbly hope, that the Lord will remember us, and not wipe out our services, though defective and defiled; that he will spare us according to the greatness of his mercy, and accept both our persons and our services: and if he remember us for good, that will be a sufficient recompense and happiness for ever: whilst they who impenitently sin against him, and especially such as disgrace a sacred character, will be remembered for evil, to their everlasting shame, confusion, and destruction.

THE BOOK OF ESTHER.

THIS book, which takes its name from the principal character introduced in it, was most probably written by Mordecai, and inserted into the canon of Scripture by Ezra and his assistants, or by their successors: but there are various opinions among learned men on this subject. The Jews have always held the book of Esther in great veneration; and as the feast of Purim, (ix. 26—32,) is observed by them to this day, no reasonable doubt can be entertained on the authenticity of the narrative.—Perhaps it was written after all the other books of the Old Testament; though in this respect also, learned men differ exceedingly. And, as it contains no prophecies, so it is not referred to in the New-Testament.—It is also very remarkable, that there is no clear mention in it of any of the names, by which the God of Israel is distinguished in the sacred oracles: yet it is most evidently intended, as well as admirably calculated, to illustrate the doctrine of Providence; and the methods and instruments by which the great Ruler of the world accomplishes his purposes, both of mercy and of judgment. Perhaps this omission of the Lord's name was designed. Facts well known, concerning the worshippers of JEHOVAH, the plot formed for their extirpation, and the wonderful deliverance vouchsafed them, were thus simply stated; in order that every reader might judge for himself, whether these facts did not demonstrate, the God of the Jews to be the great Ruler of the universe. Had this conclusion been urged on the Gentiles by a despised Jew, their prejudices might have been excited: let the simple narrative then speak for itself.—Several additional chapters are found in the Apocrypha; but they never were in the Hebrew text, and the Jews never received them: they principally contain repetitions or additions, intended to decorate the history; but which in fact destroy its simple unity and beauty: and some things in them cannot be reconciled with the times to which the history must relate.—The preceding books form a specimen of the Lord's care of his church in Judea; this shows his favour to the nation at large. Many of those who continued in remote countries, were blameable in that respect: yet he would not leave the nation in the hand of their enemies, or deprive them of his mercy and grace on that account.

CHAPTER I.

NOTES.

But various have been the opinions of learned men, concerning the Persian king, who is here called Ahasueurs. I am, however, satisfied with the arguments of Dean Prideaux; and consequently—

The princes from the several parts of Ahasuerus's immense dominions seem to have been entertained in rotation, during six months, with the greatest ostentation of wealth and liberality that could be conceived: and afterwards all the citizens of Shushan, without any distinction, were feasted for seven days in like manner. (5.)

V. 6. The beds. On these the guests sat, or reclined, at table.

V. 8. The absurd practice, of urging people to drink more strong liquor than they are of themselves inclined to, has prevailed in all ages; though it is a most gross violation of common sense, freedom, and civility, as well as of morality and religion. It seems to have been devised and supported by drunkards, that the more sober part of mankind might be drawn in to keep them in countenance by a reluctant intoxication. The regulation enjoined by the king was very necessary in the midst of so many incentives to intemperance; and his mind, being thus made known, doubtless prevented many disorders which otherwise would have been committed.

V. 10—12. When the customs of the Persians relative to their women, especially the wives of their kings, are considered, this injunction of Ahasuerus must appear highly improper and unreasonable. He sent seven of his chamberlains, (which no doubt so far was honourable to his queen;) commanding her to appear in her royal attire, in order that a number of princes and nobles, who were heated with wine, might be gratified by a sight of her singular beauty! A reluctance therefore to an exhibition, so contrary to the decorum observed by her sex, became her rank and modesty; but as the king was peremptory, and every one must have known that she came at his command, it was very imprudent in her to persist in a refusal, which could only terminate in an open contest and the most fatal effects.

V. 13, 14. These wise men being acquainted with the records of the kingdom, might be able to bring precedents how former kings had acted in circumstances in any respect similar, according to the laws and customs of the kingdom; as well as to understand in general what was proper to be done in the present emergency. (Note, 1 Chr. xii. 32.) And it was the king's manner, in all such matters, to confer with those who knew law and judgment.—The seven counsellors here mentioned had free access to the king, and were the first subjects in the kingdom. (Note, Ezra vii. 14.)

V. 15. Some suppose, that Ahasuerus was inclined to forgive Vashti, if it might stand with the honour of his government, and the laws of the realm. But others think, that he was disposed to divorce her, or otherwise punish her; but wished to proceed against her under colour of law and justice.

V. 16—18. Memucan is mentioned last of the seven counsellors; and it is supposed he was the youngest, or last in order on some account; and that he was required to give his opinion first, that he might not previously be biassed by the sentiments of the seniors or superiors. It is uncertain whether Memucan really deemed the queen's disobedience a dangerous precedent, whilst it remained unpunished; or whether he paid court to the king, by counselling him to follow his own humour, and by suggesting a plausible reason for so doing. He, however, argued that the queen's rank, and the notoriety and pertinacity of her disobedience, would encourage other women to despise the persons and authority of their husbands; which contempt would excite their wrath, and thus destroy domestic subordination and peace. Yet if the husbands had been careful not to act contemptibly, or to give foolish and improper commands, they might have ruled by reason and affection, without either such fatal consequences or such violent measures. But despotism in civil government leads to despotism in domestic life: men imagine, that there is no way to rule, but by force and terror: and thus the superior relations become tyrants, and the inferiors slaves, submitting by constraint, without either conviction or affection.

V. 22. By this irrevocable edict, which was published in the various languages spoken through the vast empire of the Persians, that all might understand it; Ahasuerus's example was virtually proposed for general imitation: so that every husband was allowed to divorce his wife, if she disobeyed his command, even when evidently foolish and unreasonable! But whether pride, resentment, policy, or lust predominated in the councils of Ahasuerus; the Lord was thus making preparation for defeating Haman's diabolical project, long before it ever entered into his heart, and before he arrived at the height of his power and prosperity.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—9.

No extent of possessions or dominion can satisfy the human heart, and give contentment or felicity even in this present life. Cares, fears, and temptations are augmented by every accession; the power of doing good or harm is enlarged, and, alas! the latter is generally chosen. But "to whom much is given, of him will much be required" by the great Proprietor, who is continually saying to monarchs, as well as subjects, "Give an account of thy stewardship; for thou mayest be no longer steward."—An ostentation of generosity and magnificence for a man's own honour and glory, that his wealth, bounty, and taste may be admired and applauded, is a common idolatry of the great and noble: and except grace prevail in the heart, self-exaltation and self-indulgence, in some form or other, will be the ruling principles. But indeed the honour of every endowment, possession, or achievement of created beings, belongs solely to the underived unchangeable Creator: his glory, in our felicity and that of our fellow-creatures, should be our great end in every action; and all other considerations ought to be subordinated to it and regulated by it. But if the feast of an earthly monarch, when he would "show the riches of his glorious kingdom" and the honour of his excellent majesty, was so magnificent; what will be that feast, which the King of kings:

By advice of his servants, Ahasuerus causes fair virgins to be sought out in every province of his kingdom, that he might choose a queen, 1—4. Esther had been brought up by Mordecai, 5—7. She obtains favour with the keeper of the women; pleases the king; and is made queen, having observed Morde-cai's directions, 8—20. Mordecai discovers a plot against the king; the criminals are punished; and his service is registered in the chronicles of the kingdom, 21—23.

AFTER these things, when the wrath of king Ahasuerus was appeased,^a he remembered Vashti, and^b what she had done, and what was decreed against her. ^a Est. vi. 14—17. ^b i. 12—19.

hath prepared, to show the riches of his glorious kingdom, and the honour of his excellent majesty, in heaven, for ever and ever? There will be unfading splendour, inexhaustible abundance, and unalloyed pleasures, without interruption or satiety! There will be no danger or fear of excess, nor the least discord to mar enjoyment, through all the ages of eternity! "All things are ready" for this feast; sinners without exception are invited: may we accept the gracious invitation, seek and find the wedding-garment, and sit down at the marriage-supper of the Lamb! —But in all other feasts, the pleasure is greatly alloyed, and soon palls; and too generally they prove unfavourable, not only to wisdom and piety, but even to present comfort and advantage. Seldom do we frequent them, without being led into some degree of excess, injurious to our strength of body and vigour of mind. They are scenes of temptation, suited to excite our various evil propensities. The enemy of souls will be sure to avail himself of our unguarded moments: and he has strangely prevailed to render it creditable, for men to become tempters of each other to intemperance; so that few public entertainments amongst professed Christians are conducted by such good rules as this heathen feast. But real Christians must not only shun such scenes, and separate from those who frequent them; but likewise by warnings and exhortations, endeavour to preserve their brethren from sin: and if, by this conduct at their own tables, they incur the censure of being penurious; "the poor, whom they always have with them," afford them a fair occasion of refuting the slander. Indeed that will go very far in hospitality to the indigent, which is quickly wasted by pampering the luxury of the affluent.

V. 10—22.

Seasons of peculiar festivity often terminate in vexation. Wine and jovial company elate the mind, add strength to the passions, and stun the voice of reason and conscience. On such occasions caprice generally dictates the conduct; unreasonable claims are started or projects formed; and the eagerness of men's spirits ill brooks contradiction or affront, whilst it disposes to give them. Thus anger is excited and exasperated; and discords, revenge, duels, and murders are the frequent consequences of pleasurable meetings! Propriety and decorum are also often disregarded: the respect and attention due to relatives are forgotten: improper requisitions are sometimes made; by which contempt and imprudent opposition are excited: affection is suspended, during the reign of haughty resentment; and all parties forget their reciprocal interests and duties, until their reputation and peace receive such wounds, as can seldom admit of a complete cure. Let it also be specially noted, that superiors should be careful not to command what may reasonably be disobeyed; for this must weaken their authority, and prove a temptation to those over whom they rule: yet inferiors ought never to persist in a refusal, except when it is a point of conscience towards God.—There would be safety in the multitude of counsellors, if men did but welcome plain-dealing; and if the counsellors of princes did not generally consult their inclinations, rather than their interests. Domestic subordination doubtless ought to be preserved: and the wife ought to honour and obey her own husband: yet surely this may be effected by other means than severe laws, divorces, and measures more pernicious than the evil they are intended to remedy! Regard to mutual interest, comfort, and reputation, serve to keep the world in tolerable order: the prudence and affection of the husband will do great things, where properly exercised: the general regard, which the more decent members of the community have to the precepts and authority of God, has considerable effect: true grace radically cures that evil, from which domestic discord arises: and where the peace of society is materially violated, the magistrate may properly interpose. All other evils arising from this source may better be tolerated, than to attempt a remedy, by making the men tyrants and the women slaves: whilst it is evident that the former fail as much, and commonly far more, in the duty of their relation than the latter. Nor should even the interests of kingdoms be promoted, were it possible, by evident injustice. The example of the great has a very extensive effect, and they are the more concerned not to exhibit a pernicious pattern to their inferiors: but human policy sometimes overshoots its mark; and to prevent the effect of one injurious precedent, forms another of still more fatal tendency. Let us then keep to the rule of God's word, and it will guide the humble obedient believer through all these labyrinths; and be "a lantern to his feet, and a light unto all his paths." Let us be upon our guard against every incentive to our passions; watching and praying against wrath, pride, and self-will. Let us learn to bridle our tempers, and to conquer by yielding; and to "leave off contention before it be meddled with." And let us rejoice that the Lord reigns, and will over-rule all the madness and folly of mankind, for the purposes of his own glory, and the safety and felicity of his people.

2 Then said the king's servants, that ministered unto him, ^a Let there be fair young virgins sought for the king :

3 And let the king appoint officers ^o in all the provinces of his kingdom, that they may gather together all the fair young virgins unto Shushan the palace, to the house of the women, unto ^{*} the custody of ^f Hegai the king's chamberlain, keeper of the women ; and let ^g their things for purification be given them :

was probably sensible, that he had acted with precipitation and severity, and had done her injustice. But with all his authority, he could not again receive her into favour, without violating a fundamental constitution of the Persian government ; which required that no edict, that the king had once established, should be reversed ; (Dan. vi. 15.) The fatal effects of this absurd policy will be sufficiently illustrated, in the sequel of this narrative. Under colour of ascribing infallibility to the sovereign, and thus flattering his pride, this restriction perpetually exposed him, in his unguarded hours, to be deluded into the most pernicious measures ; and would not so much as allow him to remedy the injustice or impolicy into which he had been betrayed, when reflection and experience had made him sensible of his errors. And this was the more absurd and dangerous in its nature and effects, if they may be depended on who inform us, that the Persian monarchs, and their counsellors, commonly framed their edicts at feasts, and when they were drinking.

V. 2—4. It is uncertain whether this was the project of the seven counsellors, or of some other servants who more immediately ministered to the king's pleasures. It seems, however, to have been devised, in order to prevent him from thinking any more of Vashti, whose restoration to favour must be guarded against, for the safety of those who had counselled the king to exercise such severity against her. For if he had been greatly desirous of Vashti's company, the law of the Medes and Persians would scarcely have prevented him from recalling her. This will appear by the following instance. Cambyzes king of Persia, having conceived a violent passion for his own sister, inquired of his counsellors whether it was lawful for him to marry her ? And they dreading the effects of his resentment if they opposed his will, answered, that there was no law in Persia by which a man was allowed to marry his sister, but that it was lawful for the king of Persia to do what he pleased.

V. 5—7. Mordecai, though a Benjamite, is repeatedly called the Jew : for the whole nation was now called after Judah. (Note, Gen. xlix. 8—10.)—Some of Mordecai's ancestors, (perhaps Kish,) had been carried to Babylon with Jeconiah ; and the family afterwards settled at Shushan. But it seems that they were diminished in number, or impoverished : so that Mordecai's own cousin had been left an orphan ; and he, probably being much older than she was, had brought her up, and in all respects behaved as a father to her. Her Jewish name was Hadassah ; but the Persians called her Esther. The conjectures of some learned men concerning her, taken from rather a slight similarity of names between her and the wives of some of the Persian kings mentioned in Pagan historians, seem entirely groundless : as the dissimilarity of character and other circumstances vastly preponderates against them.

V. 8—10. As Mordecai was so scrupulous in respect to Haman, it has been wondered how he could consent to Esther's becoming the wife or concubine of a heathen prince, contrary to the law of Moses. But it does not seem to have been left to the choice either of Mordecai or of Esther. By a public edict, the most beautiful virgins were selected from all parts of Ahasuerus's dominions ; and it would have been unavailing, as well as dangerous, to have opposed the persons employed in this business. 'The word 11 And Mordecai ^a walked every day before the court of the women's house, to know [¶] how Esther did, and what should become of her.

12 ¶ Now when every maid's turn was come ^y to go in to king Ahasuerus, after that she had been twelve months, according to the manner of the women, (for so were the days of their purifications accomplished, to wit, ^z six months with oil of myrrh, and six months with sweet odours, and with other things for the purifying of the women;)

13 Then thus came every maiden unto the king; whatsoever she desired was given her, to go with her out of the house of the women, unto the king's house.

14 In the evening she went, and on the morrow she returned into the second house of the women, to the custody of Shaashgaz, the king's chamberlain, which kept the concubines: she came in unto the king no more, except the king ^a delighted in her, and that ^b she were called by name.

15 ¶ Now when the turn of Esther, the daughter of Abihail the uncle of Mordecai, ^c who had taken her for his daughter, was come to go in unto the king, she required nothing but what Hegai the king's chamberlain, the keeper of the women, appointed. And ^d Esther obtained favour in the sight of all them that looked upon her.

16 So Esther was taken unto king Ahasuerus into his house royal in ^e the tenth month, which is the month Tebeth, in ^f the seventh year of his reign.

17 And the king loved Esther above all the women, and she obtained grace and ^{*} favour [†] in his sight more than all the virgins; ^g so that he set the royal crown upon her head, and made her queen instead of Vashti.

18 Then the king ^h made a great feast unto all his princes and his servants, even Esther's feast; and he made a [‡] release to the provinces, and ⁱ gave gifts according to the state of the king.

19 And when ^k the virgins were gathered together the second time, then Mordecai ^l sat in the king's gate.

20 Esther ^m had not yet shewed her kindred nor her people: as Mordecai had charged her: for Esther did the commandment of Mordecai, like as when she was brought up with him.

21 ¶ In those days, while Mordecai sat in the king's gate, two of the king's chamberlains, ⁿ Bigthan and Teresh, of those which kept the ^o door, were wroth, ^o and sought to lay hand on the king Ahasuerus.

22 And ^p the thing was known to Mordecai, who told it unto Esther the queen;

⁶ we translate was brought, may be rendered was taken; and that by force, as the word sometimes signifies; and as the former Targum explains it, She was brought by violence. (Bp. Patrick.) If Esther had made known to what nation she belonged, it might have interfered with her advancement to the rank of queen; because of the contempt with which the Jews were generally treated: but she could not have avoided becoming one of Ahasuerus's concubines. Polygamy was connived at, even by the Mosaic law, so that the situation of a concubine was not deemed dishonourable or unlawful; and in her peculiar circumstances, the ritual law of not giving their daughters to those of another nation might not be thought obligatory. The conduct of Providence, however, should be chiefly noticed: though it does not appear that either Mordecai or Esther could have acted otherwise, if they had been inclined.

V. 16. In the seventh, &c. About four years were spent before another queen was chosen in the stead of Vashti: so long a time had been employed in collecting the virgins from all parts of Ahasuerus's dominions, and in other preparations which were thought requisite. Ezra obtained his commission this same year if Artaxerxes were the same as Ahasuerus.

V. 19, 20. It is probable that a number of virgins had been collected before Vashti was made queen: in relation to which it is here said, "When the virgins were gathered together the second time."—About this time Mordecai seems to have been appointed to some station in the service of the king: and the historian seems merely to have intended to connect the account of Mordecai's discovery of the treason, with Esther's advancement to be queen; as introductory to the subsequent narrative.—Esther, after her high preferment, still continued as attentive to Mordecai's command as she had been before, out of gratitude for his kindness, and confidence in his wisdom, piety, and affection.

V. 21. Many conjectures have been formed of the cause of this conspiracy, and the manner in which it was discovered; but curiosity alone is concerned in such inquiries. It suffices for us to know, that a conspiracy was formed, that Mordecai detected it, and that the account of it was written in the records of the kingdom. The transaction itself was nowise uncommon: but the event showed the hand of God in it, in a most remarkable manner, and for the most important purposes.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—14.

Resolutions formed in anger, and executed without deliberation, make work for bitter recollection and repentance! A wise man therefore will not proceed even to punish the guilty, till passion has subsided and reason resumed her sway. The depravity of nature, and the fallibility of our judgment render it indispensable to our interest and happiness, that we be allowed to change our sentiments and conduct, and correct our mistakes. Our gracious God hath mercifully placed us under a dispensation which admits of this: and though many painful effects must follow from our transgressions, we shall not be ruined by them, if we avail ourselves of this provision. But whilst pride and obstinacy seem to arrogate infallibility, and to aspire to a dignity incompatible with fallen nature; they forfeit the real advantages of our situation, and leave a man without redress, exposed to all the fatal consequences of every false step that he takes. No one, however, should be too proud to confess that he hath been mistaken: and as this would preclude the absurdity of human laws, that may never be repealed or reversed; so it would strike at the root of that self-justifying pertinacious temper, which induces sinners to neglect the Gospel, and go on in sin. But even when men are in some measure made sensible of their folly and iniquity, new projects, amusements, and gratifications, are devised, to silence conscience, and to carry them forward without uneasiness in the broad road of ungodliness. The servants of mighty monarchs, though themselves princes and nobles, have often stooped to be pimps and parasites, in order to support their present authority, to purchase impunity for past crimes, or to procure future and still greater preferment! But how degrading is it to our rational nature, that numbers of able men and of superior rank, as well as of inferior station, should exert all their ingenuity and diligence in enabling an individual more devotedly to pamper those "fleshly lusts which war against the soul!" Even reason, (as well as religion,) if her voice could be heard, would command men to moderate and restrain their passions, and teach them submission, by habituating them to brook denial. But the higher human beings are advanced in authority, the lower they often sink into the most abject slavery to their sensual appetites! as if the superiority was intended merely as a medium for the more unrestrained licentiousness, and to enable them to be avowed in those excesses, which inferior libertines indulge with a more decent reserve!—How low is our nature sunk, when these are the leading pursuits and the highest felicity, of many millions of rational creatures! When every consideration of decency, equity, and conscience; when domestic comfort, relative duties, and the natural rights of mankind; when even reputation, interest, and health; when life, and the immortal soul itself, are habitually sacrificed to such a vile and hateful idol! Yet after a prostituted ingenuity has done its utmost, disappointment, vexation, and loathing must ensue; and that man most wisely consults even the enjoyment of this present life, who most exactly obeys the precepts of the divine law. We ought also to be thankful for revelation, which is needful to teach us how to act in the common affairs of life. But without the supernatural efficacy of God's Spirit, men will not pay a due regard to that revelation: for with the Bible in their hands, numbers deviate at least as widely from reason and Scripture as ever the Persian monarchs did; except as the want of power, and the law of the land restrain their licentiousness. For these laws indeed, and for many other advantages, we have great cause to be thankful: and especially, that the children of Britons are not liable to be forced into the Seraglio of any licentious ruler. Yet, alas! after all, who can bear steadily to contemplate the corrupt state of our favoured nation, in this respect, without a mixture of shame, regret, and consternation!

V. 15—23.

It is peculiarly useful to consider the providential conduct of God fulfilling his wise, faithful, righteous, and merciful purposes, in the midst of the extravagancies occasioned by the mad passions of wicked men. He careth for his people, and he is the Father of the fatherless: orphans are often peculiarly favoured in his providence, to encourage us to intrust our children to his care whilst we live, and when we are about to die and leave them. It is our duty, in some cases, if we are able, to provide for the orphan children of our near relations; and by so doing, men often provide for their own comfort and safety, and for their families also. The Lord not only confers personal and mental endowments, and enriches the soul with wisdom and grace; but he gives favour likewise, and notwithstanding prejudices and general contempt, he can, when he pleases, secure to his people the most endeared affection of those who know him not. If wealth or kingdoms were good for them, they would certainly have them: but prosperity too generally feeds the distempers of corrupt nature, and poverty and obscurity are more advantageous. Even those high stations, which some few believers occupy for the good of their brethren, will be their cross, if not their snare: and their comforts must flow from the same source, and be of the same nature, with those of the poorest Christian; and are generally in a more scanty measure. We ought, however, to be passive in the Lord's hands; and only be careful to avoid sin and to perform our duty, in whatever station we are placed. Our profession of religion, and many things relating to it, must be often regulated and timed according to circumstances; so that we not only need to regard the advice of wise and experienced Christians, but daily to ask for that wisdom, which is from above, or we shall be liable to perpetual mistakes. It is a singular proof that men have obtained a good measure of that wisdom, when unexpected prosperity and favour leave

CHAP. III.

Haman is advanced by the king, who commands his servants to bow down to him; but Mordecai refuses to do it, 1—3. Haman, in revenge, purposes to destroy the whole Jewish nation, 4—6. He chooses a day, by casting lots, for executing his purpose, 7. By cunning he obtains a commission from the king to extirpate the Jews, and publishes it through all the provinces, 8—15.

AFTER these things did king Ahasuerus ^a promote Haman, the son of Hammedatha the ^b Agagite, and advanced him, and set his seat ^c above all the princes that were with him.

them humble and teachable, attentive to every relative duty, grateful to benefactors, and disposed to listen to prudent and pious counsellors. No men are exposed to so great danger, from treachery, resentment, and ambition, as absolute monarchs: and their servants, when really attached, often confer obligations upon them which they never can adequately compensate. But the servant of God must be faithful to every trust, and watchful for the safety and interest of those who employ him: and though he seem at present neglected, he may be remembered hereafter. However, his conscientious and upright conduct is registered in heaven, and will be graciously rewarded by his God; when all his enemies shall be driven into utter destruction.

NOTES.

CHAP. III. V. 1. Haman is supposed to have been an Amalekite, descended from the stock of the ancient kings of that people, many of whom were named Agag.—If his descent was generally known, his advancement to be the king's chief minister and favourite would be peculiarly displeasing to the Jews; as they were expressly commanded to extirpate all the Amalekites. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 2. It has been much disputed, why Mordecai so pertinaciously and absolutely refused to bow before Haman, when commanded by his prince: and many, supposing that nothing more was meant than civil obeisance, such as Joseph's brethren and the Egyptians rendered to him; and such as they suppose Ezra and Nehemiah, and even Daniel must have paid to the Persian kings, have ascribed Mordecai's refusal to his contempt of Haman's character, or his dislike to him as an Amalekite. But these reasons do not seem sufficient to justify his conduct, when the fate of the whole nation was at stake: yet he evidently acted conscientiously, and was accepted by the Lord; so that we must not ascribe his behaviour to pride, moroseness, resentment, or envy. It is, however, well known, that the Persian monarchs required an obeisance, which even the Greeks often refused or evaded, as express adoration: and

2 And all ^a the king's servants, that ^d were in the king's gate, ^e bowed, and ^f revered Haman: for the king had so commanded concerning him. But Mordecai ^g bowed not, nor did him reverence.

3 Then the king's servants which were in the king's gate, said unto Mordecai, ^h Why transgressest thou the king's commandment?

4 Now it came to pass, ⁱ when they spake daily unto him, and he hearkened not unto them, ^j that they told Haman, to see whether Mordecai's matters would stand: for ^k he had told them that he was a Jew.

5 And when Haman saw ^l that Mordecai bowed not, nor did him reverence, then was Haman ^m full of wrath

it is not at all unlikely, but Ahasuerus required a similar act of adoration to be offered to his favourite. 'To bow' the knee or body, to all great persons, was a common respect; for which there needed not a particular command, with respect of Haman. There was therefore some kind of divine honour intended, such as was paid to the Persian kings themselves, to whom the Greeks would not pay this sort of respect, because it was accounted divine. And the word reverence imports something beyond bowing; which was falling flat on their faces to the ground.' (Bp. Patrick.) The original words may be rendered, "They kneeled down and fell prostrate before Haman," or worshipped him: and perhaps the two expressions are never united, except when adoration is expressly meant. (Matt. iv. 9. Acts x. 25, 26. Rev. xxii. 8, 9.) In the apocryphal addition to this book, Mordecai is introduced as thus appealing to God: 'Thou knowest, Lord, that it was neither in contempt or pride, nor for any desire of glory, that I did not bow down to proud Haman; for I could have been content, with good will, for the salvation of Israel, to kiss the soles of his feet: but I did this, that I might not prefer the glory of man above the glory of God, neither will I worship any but thee.' Indeed it is most probable that the homage required by Haman was idolatrous: and we may reasonably conclude, that the king himself dispensed with the customary ceremonies, out of regard to the conscientious scruples of those few Jews that were admitted into his presence, and whom he peculiarly favoured; but that Haman, despising Mordecai and hating his people, was not so condescending. And though we do not read that other Jews refused Haman this honour; yet numbers might be of the same opinion, who were not put to the trial, not being employed in any places of honour or profit about the king: and indeed it does not appear that Mordecai was blamed by any of them, even amidst the most imminent danger to which the nation was exposed.

V. 3—5. Haman seems not to have noticed Mordecai's

6 And he thought scorn to lay hands on Mordecai alone; for they had shewed him the people of Mordecai: wherefore Haman ^a sought to destroy all the Jews, that were throughout the whole kingdom of Ahasuerus, even the people of Mordecai.

singularity, (amidst the homage he received from all others,) till it was pointed out to him by the other servants of Ahasuerus. These at first remonstrated with Mordecai for his disobedience to the king: but when he disregarded them, they desired to know whether "his matters would stand: for he had told them that he was a Jew." This proves, that he vindicated himself on the ground of his religion: and it implies, that he expected Ahasuerus to admit of this plea; which favours the supposition, that the kings of Persia had been used to excuse their Jewish servants from such obeisance as they could not conscientiously render. It is, however, likely that these informers thought this a good opportunity of paying court to the favourite, or of obtaining his post for some of them or their dependents; or they did not approve of his singularity, by which he seemed to reproach their compliance.

V. 6. A wise man would have treated this information with neglect: and had he even thought that the refusal proceeded from pique, pride, malice, or insolence, he would have left Mordecai to his humour. But Haman was a man of a weak and vain-glorious mind, and intoxicated with prosperity. Being therefore fired with indignation, that these honours were refused him by one so far inferior, and having understood that the refusal was the effect of principles which were common to all the Jews; he considered the whole nation as his enemies, and determined, if possible, to involve them all in one common destruction. The ancient enmity of an Amalekite seems also to have revived; and perhaps he meant to revenge the quarrel of his nation, as well as the affront which he had received from Mordecai. His rank and authority, and unbounded influence over Ahasuerus, emboldened him to expect success in so daring an attempt. His self-importance made him think it a mean revenge to crush an individual who had offended him: and his pre-eminence seemed only to suggest the idea of being able to do more mischief, and diffuse more extensive misery, than an inferior could have done. His diabolical ambition and cruelty therefore thirsted for the extirpation of the whole people of the Jews, at one blow; at least all of them who dwelt in the vast kingdom of Persia, including those in Judea, which was a province of that kingdom. We may therefore fairly conclude that the device was not his own, but was suggested by that ambitious spirit, who aspires to be the god of this world, who has been a murderer from the beginning, and whose enmity to the Seed of the woman, to Christ and his church, is communicated to all his children. And in this view, it was a plan worthy of the vast capacity, enmity, malice, ambition, and desperation of that arch rebel against his Maker.

V. 7. Esther had now been queen five years: yet her nation and kindred had not become publicly known: for Haman did not suspect that the queen was a Jewess, or that Mordecai was her near relation. Had Mordecai been ambitious of preferment, no doubt he would have counselled Esther to make known her kindred, when she was first in high favour: but he seems to have foreseen, that she was advanced for some future service to her people, for which she ought to reserve herself. The word Pur signifies the lot. And Haman, having formed his project, inquired of his idols according to his own superstition, by casting lots what day would be most propitious to its execution: for he made himself sure of the king's concurrence. And it pleased God so to order it, that the day which had the favourable token was above eleven months distant. Haman's superstition was such that he did not venture to attempt any thing till that time came; though he could not but perceive, that many things might occur to prevent the execution of his intentions. The king might change his mind, or might die: or the Jews might take refuge in other countries, or make such preparations for their own defence, as to render the attempt most perilous, and the success of it very hazardous. The event showed the vanity of his oracles or auguries: and illustrated the doctrine of a particular providence over all the affairs of men, and the care of God over his church.

V. 8, 9. Haman seems not even to have mentioned to Ahasuerus the name of the people whom he purposed to extirpate; they would be sufficiently known from his description of them. He probably acted as prime-minister under the king, who, like most of those eastern monarchs, giving himself up to his pleasures, left the management of his affairs entirely to him. Nay, the ascendancy of Haman was so absolute, that none of the other counsellors seem to have been advised with in this most important matter; and probably the proposal was made and consented to, whilst the king was heated with wine!—The laws and customs of the people of God were indeed diverse from those of any other: but there is no proof that they refused obedience to the laws of Persia, except as Mordecai refused to worship Haman; for we do not find that the kings of Persia required them to worship idols, or even forbade them to observe their sabbaths, festivals, and ceremonial institutions. The horrible cruelty and injustice of the proposal did not, as far as it appears, at all startle the king. Indeed Haman seems to have been more apprehensive that he would object to the impolicy of diminishing the revenue, by decreasing the number of his subjects. He therefore offered the king ten thousand talents of silver, or about four millions sterling, if reckoned according to the talent of the Jews, by way of compensation for the loss. But it seems, that he meant to indemnify himself from the property of the slaughtered Jews: and the expression, "that he would pay the money into the hands of those that had the charge of the business," implies that he would engage to raise the sum at once from the execution of his project; which would, as he pretended, be more than equivalent to all subsequent disadvantages.

V. 10, 11. Without some acquaintance with the human heart, and with the history of mankind, we should find a difficulty in conceiving how any prince could be induced to consent to such a horrid and ruinous proposal, without objection or hesitation! It would be absurd to give a reason for so infatuated a measure. But when an arbitrary monarch has become the dupe of a wicked favourite; it has always been observed, that the first object of his life, the main and almost the only use that he makes of his power, is to gratify and aggrandize him: and the lives of subjects or the interest of empires, have on such occasions often been wantonly sacrificed to the avarice, the ambition, the revenge, or the caprice of a worthless minion!—"So loth are men that love their pleasure, to take any pains to distinguish between truth and falsehood." (Bp. Patrick.)—As a token that the request was granted, Ahasuerus gave the ring, with his royal signet from his own hand, to the enemy and oppressor of the Jews; and he also granted to him all the spoil, without making any payment into the treasury; thus Haman seemed about to obtain the most

V. 12—15. Haman hastened to get the grant of the king established into a decree, and published throughout the empire; that the sentence might be looked upon as irreversible, and that all the subjects might prepare to carry it into execution, as they tendered the favour of the king, and of his minister. Thus he expected, that the hope of ingratiating themselves at court, and the enmity borne the Jews, would unite the inhabitants of every city and province in this bloody massacre; and doubtless he intended to stir them up, and lead them to the attack, by his emissaries; and to further encourage them, they were allowed to take the spoil of the Jews to themselves as a prey. That his meaning might not be mistaken, he caused the edict to be drawn up with a remarkable repetition, and almost in the style of modern law: they were commanded, "to destroy, kill, and cause to perish," all the Jews in one day! When this strange decree was published, it caused much perplexity and consternation, not only to the Jews, but to all considerate men, especially at Shushan: for they could not but tremble for themselves, when they perceived what a bloody tyrant had possession of authority: and they must foresee, that terrible effects would follow from such a mad and rash attempt, which would render an immense number of people desperate, and drive them to the most furious courage in their own defence. But Haman, insensible to every thing, but the gratification of his revenge; and to keep such reflections and reports at a distance from the king, engaged him in pleasure and indulgence; and they sat down to drink, as perfectly unconcerned in the event!

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The favourites of earthly princes have often been chiefly distinguished by their folly, pride, and profligacy; but those of the King of heaven are endowed with wisdom and grace, and prepared for usefulness in their several situations. The vanity and worthlessness of earthly dignities and possessions, are shown by their being so commonly lavished upon the basest of the human species; God having provided better things for the objects of his special love. The poison of the old serpent, infused by his first temptation, "Ye shall be as gods," still rankles in the human heart: and when the pride of man is emboldened by great prosperity, it is capable of openly affecting the honour and worship that belongs to God alone! We are all by nature idolaters, and self is the most favourite of our idols: and whilst we admire and glory in our own supposed excellences, we delight that others should join the incense of this adulation; we are pleased to be treated as if every thing were at our disposal, and within the reach of our capacity, and that all around should submit to and bow before us. And when this vast ambition occupies a narrow mind, and the possessor climbs the pinnacle of earthly grandeur, he forgets that he is a man; and acts as if the world was made for him, and was to be governed by him; and as if all its inhabitants were created to be his slaves, and to worship at his shrine! The desire of the favour, and the fear of the wrath, of monarchs, influence most men to allow of such arrogant claims, and to conform to this strange idolatry: and those princes who have literally demanded altars, sacrifices, and incense to their own deity, have generally met with a ready and zealous compliance from the most of their subjects! But the true believer can neither obey such edicts and conform to such fashions, nor be induced, by any persuasions or menaces, to violate the law of God or the dictates of his own conscience. He must "obey God rather than men," and leave the consequences to him; and whether his matters will stand, and his religion excuse his disobedience to unlawful commands in human courts of justice or not, he will certainly be justified in so doing before the tribunal of God. Who can know the desperate wickedness of the human heart, or prescribe any bounds to its devices? When a man possesses the dangerous privilege of doing as he pleases, without control and with impunity; when pride and ambition meet with an unexpected rebuff, and when indignation and revenge occupy the heart; the most horrible and diabolical designs will be considered as the evidences of a noble and daring mind. In such circumstances the infuriated wretch will think scorn of the petty rapines and assassinations of inferior villains, and become ambitious of being as much distinguished by a vast revenge, as by the eminency of his rank: and what massacres and crimes will not in that case be perpetrated without remorse, and even with pride and pleasure; whilst vast numbers both fall victims to his fury, and are involved with him in the guilt of murder and other enormities! We have therefore cause to be thankful for external restraints to our headstrong passions; and we ought to watch and pray continually against pride, anger, malice, and every sinful propensity; for if left under the power of them, we cannot conceive how far they will hurry us. And let us also remember to be thankful for a limited, mild, and equitable government; and to beg of God to extend the same blessing to all other nations.

V. 7—15.

The world, as lying in wickedness, must hate the people of God, who bear his image and do his will: but they will be peculiarly obnoxious to tyrants; as they must refuse unreserved compliance with their mandates and humours; being the subjects of another kingdom, and governed by laws diverse from, and opposite to, their favourite maxims and pursuits. They are indeed, and ought to be, a peculiar and singular people, not conformed to this world, whilst they are dispersed in the various parts of it: and they should be willing to be treated as precise, conceited, and unpliant. But they who persuade princes that it is not for their profit to tolerate them; and that they had better persecute, destroy, or banish them, are as much enemies to the state as to the church of God. Whatever mere professors may be, true Christians are the best subjects under every government: not only because they are more peaceable, honest, and industrious than their neighbours, and conscientiously pay tribute, and render obedience in all things lawful; but because their examples and conversation edify many, and their prayers bring down a blessing upon the land where they live in peace. No acquisitions of wealth therefore could compensate the loss of them, even in a political view of the question; and without bringing into the account the enormous load of national guilt which persecution rapidly accumulates. Men are often lavish in the expenses of their lusts; and thus, shame those Christians that are penurious in promoting the cause of God: ungodly men, however, often find means by one of their crimes to bear the expenses of the rest; and it is through defect of ingenuity or power, if they do not always accomplish it. Inconsiderate princes, who are the slaves of pleasure and dupes to their favourites, may, though humane in their own dispositions, become as mischievous as the most bloody tyrants; by consenting, through false accusations, to that injustice and cruelty which they would have abhorred, if they had taken the pains to inquire into the business. Thus the most important interests of millions are sacrificed to the humour, emolument, or revenge of some worthless wretch; who regards the humour of his patron no more than he does the happiness of the people, and is as insensible to gratitude as to compassion. But we may cease to wonder that such things have been done, when we consider how individuals in every station of life sacrifice their credit, interest, health, and connexions, and even shorten their lives, as well as ruin their souls, for the sake of the most contemptible gratifications: and though sensible of their danger, they have no power to resist the craving of an inordinate unreasonable inclination! When this becomes the case of one in authority, and unites with his other passions and partialities; intoxication and excess extinguish every remaining spark of humanity, and stupidity conscience and reflection; and he and his companions will be revelling with unfeeling and unseasonable mirth, whilst thousands are deploring the fatal effects of their pernicious counsels. But the Lord bounds the effects of man's malice, as he does the raging waves of the ocean: even superstition, though baneful in itself, may sometimes operate as a useful restraint on those who are free from every other; and it has often so dismayed wicked men, in the full career of prosperous wickedness, that they have receded from, or postponed their purposes, till opportunity has been given to render them abortive. Thus "the counsel of the Lord shall stand, and he will do all his pleasure:" and "they that trust in him shall never be confounded."

NOTES.

CHAP. IV. V. 1. Mordecai, besides giving vent to his own sorrows, by his open lamentations, and by the habit of a penitent mourner, doubtless intended to excite the attention of his people to the extent of their danger, and to the proper method of seeking deliverance. Probably he was the most considerable Jew in Shushan, and so immediately struck at by the decree; and therefore he thus avowed his relation to the Jews, and called upon them to unite in seeking protection from God.

V. 2. Nothing was allowed to enter within the palace which did not bear the aspect of joy and pleasure, or which could remind the king of misery or mortality. Thus, whatever oppressions were committed upon the subjects, all complaints were discouraged, and care was taken to prevent the king from being troubled with the report of them. Mordecai, therefore, when expressing his grief by the customary tokens, might not enter to his usual place of attendance: but he walked as near it as he could, that being noticed Esther might hear of him; through whom he seems already to have entertained hopes of deliverance.

V. 3. We cannot doubt but the fastings and weeping of the Jews were attended by constant prayers and supplications; yet all mention of them, and of the object of their worship, seems to have been carefully and purposely avoided, both here and elsewhere.

V. 4. Some of the queen's attendants were, it seems, acquainted with her relation to Mordecai, and his excessive grief being noticed, she soon heard of it. As a token of her sincere sympathy with him in his sorrow, and her unabated affection for so kind a benefactor, she sent him change of raiment, according to the custom of the times: in order perhaps, that he might resume his place: but she seems not to have known the cause of his affliction; and his refusal to be comforted would lead her to conclude, that it was for some very great and terrible calamity.

V. 5. The wives and concubines of the Persian kings were watched with such jealous strictness, that the queen herself had not liberty to go out of the precincts of the palace, to confer in person with so near a relative; nor might he have access to her, especially in mourning! So that she could only inquire the cause of his excessive sorrow, by the interposition of the chamberlains, whom the king had appointed to attend on her.

and gave him commandment unto Mordecai;

11 All the king's servants, and the people of the king's provinces, do know, that whosoever, whether man or woman, shall come unto the king into ^o the inner court, who is not called, there is ^p one law of his to put him to death, except such to whom ^q the king shall hold out the golden sceptre, that he may live: ^r but I have not been called to come in unto the king these thirty days.

12 And they told to Mordecai Esther's words.

13 Then Mordecai commanded to answer Esther, ^s Think not with thyself that thou shalt escape in the king's house, more than all the Jews.

14 For if thou altogether holdest thy peace at this time, ^t then shall there * enlargement and deliverance arise to the Jews from another place; but ^u thou and thy father's house shall be destroyed: and who knoweth ^v whether thou art come to the kingdom ^w for such a time as this?

15 ¶ Then Esther bade them return Mordecai this answer,

16 Go, gather together all the Jews that are [†] present in Shushan, and ^z fast ye for me, and neither ^a eat nor drink three days, night or day: ^b I also and my maidens will fast likewise; and so will I go in unto the king, which is not according to the law: and ^c if I perish, I perish.

17 So Mordecai [‡] went his way, and did according to all that Esther had commanded him.

V. 11. That whosoever, &c. It may be supposed, that this law was framed under the pretext of securing the person of the king from the assaults of conspirators; and of maintaining his dignity; that being seldom seen, he might be considered as a kind of deity: but it would serve also to protect his ministers and favourites from detection, in their oppressions or pernicious measures; for in general the king must see with their eyes, and hear with their ears, and receive their reports: and if any one would venture to present to him a complaint, petition, appeal, or information, he must do it at the hazard of his life; for the king would seldom call for any person, in opposition to his counsellors and ministers. By this method he was also excluded from liberal society and converse; so that his palace in the city, and his pavilions in the camp, became a kind of prison: and no wonder, that princes who were so immured, became morose and humoursome, and prepared for every kind of tyranny and cruelty. As the law extended to the women likewise, we may suppose that this was intended to free the monarch from molestation, when his affections had been transferred from former objects to more successful rivals; for if the queen went into his presence uncalled, immediate death was the inevitable consequence, if he happened to be displeased at her intrusion. And as Esther had not been called for, during a whole month, she had some reason to fear that she had lost the king's favour; and that she should also lose her life, if she presumed to enter uncalled into his presence. Probably Haman had occupied the king's mind with every species of licentious pleasure, that he might think no further of the edict which he had confirmed and published.

V. 13, 14. Mordecai represented to Esther, that in case the decree against her people should be executed, she would certainly be known to be a Jewess, and would be slain even in the king's palace, by some of the envious and malicious enemies of that nation. But, being strong in faith, he was assured, that God would by some means deliver his people; and that, if she refused to venture her life in the cause, their enlargement would be attended by some remarkable judgment upon her, and all her remaining relations. He also thought it very likely, that she had been advanced to her present dignity, on purpose to be the deliverer of her nation in this perilous crisis. It is remarkable that sentiments so replete with faith and piety are conveyed to us, without the mention of God or Providence! This seems to have been done intentionally.

V. 16. Neither, &c. Some think that this only means, that the Jews were required to abstain from all delicacies, and to fast each day till after sun-set: but perhaps on this extraordinary occasion, all, who had no good excuse, fasted from the morning of the first, until some time on the third day, without eating any thing. The queen herself, however, conformed to the same rule which she prescribed to others: and she had obtained some attendants, who were willing to unite with her in the exercises of devotion, though it is not probable that they were Jewesses: and when preparation had been made, by solemn humiliation before God, no doubt accompanied by fervent, united, and persevering prayer, she determined, by an heroic act of faith and love, to venture her life in the cause of her people: and if it were the will of the Lord, that she should be put to death, she was ready to acquiesce in his appointment.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—9.

Public calamities, especially those which oppress the church of God, should more affect our hearts than any private affliction: and it is peculiarly distressing to a generous mind to be even the occasion of suffering to others. — Vain is the attempt of man to banish misery from his heart by any of those varied devices which he tries for that purpose. A refuge from the wrath to come is indeed provided: and an effectual support under temporal afflictions, and victory over death itself: but most men content themselves with striving to forget their misery, instead of seeking and securing happiness! Yet the approach of

Esther, venturing uncalled before the king, is graciously received; and being encouraged to make her request, she invites the king and Haman to a banquet, 1—5. Being again asked what was her request, she invites them to another banquet the next day, 6—8. Haman, proud of this distinction, and elated by prosperity, is disquieted by Mordecai's neglect, and complains of it to his friends and his wife, 9—13. By their advice he erects a gallows for his execution the next morning, 14.

NOW it came to pass ^a on the third ^{a iv. 16.} day, that Esther put on ^b her royal ^{b i. 11. viii. 19} apparel, and stood ^c in the inner court of ^{c Matt. x. 16. xi} the king's house, over against the king's ^{c 1 Pet. iii. 2} ^{c iv. 11. vi. 4.}

death, as well as its consequences, must be formidable, in proportion as it is unexpected and unprepared for. Exalted stations and envied distinctions abridge the liberty of the possessors, and preclude them from the most agreeable society. Pride, envy, suspicion, and other unreasonable passions, render them slaves to cumbrous forms; and to preserve their dignity, or from fear of giving offence, they often have less opportunity of enjoyment or improvement than their inferiors, and become the ignorant dupes of designing men in matters of the greatest importance! Too often laws also are framed to subserve men's lusts: and in every government, the more cause is given for complaint, the less liberty is allowed to complain. But let us rejoice that the righteous Lord reigneth, and upon a mercy-seat. To him we have access at all times, his golden sceptre is ever held forth to encourage our approach; we cannot come uncalled into his presence when we plead the Saviour's name; our danger consists in keeping at too great a distance, not in drawing too near; if he hath taken us for the objects of his peculiar love, he will never cast us off; and it is our own fault if we have not daily access to him and communion with him. Though we have no reason to complain of his dispensations, we have frequently cause to bemoan our afflictions, to deprecate the miseries we are exposed to, and to appeal to him against our oppressors, persecutors, and tempters: and we are charged to present our daily petitions at his throne of grace, for the whole church of God and all the members of it, according to their several difficulties, trials, and services; as well as for the conversation and salvation of our fellow-sinners. For this purpose, we should inquire of the state of our brethren, how they fare? and of the cause of God, how it prospers? that we may be directed in our prayers, and in our endeavours to serve the common cause by the due improvement of our talents. And if we be thus disposed, we shall seldom want opportunities of comforting the mourners, protecting the oppressed, or succouring those that are in tribulation or necessity.

V. 10—17.

As the enemies of the church are instigated by malice to be unwearied in mischief, surely we should be constrained by love to be as unwearied in doing good. But we are prone to shrink from perilous and self-denying services: and to think ourselves sufficiently excused for neglecting an opportunity of important usefulness, if we can truly say, that it would have been embraced at the hazard of liberty or life. Yet, as the disciples of him who laid down his life for us, we ought also, if properly called to it, to lay down our lives for the brethren: and no labour, loss, or suffering in the way, will justify us in neglecting the duty of our station. If then Christians, who are placed in exalted stations, show a disposition to consult their own ease and safety rather than the public good, they should be plainly remonstrated with, and reminded that their interest and that of God's people are inseparable; that their enemies are the same; that he who sinfully determines "to save his life, shall lose it;" that enlargement and deliverance will arise to the church of God from some quarter; but if they from selfish motives refuse the privilege of being his instruments, the honour will be given to others, and disgrace or ruin will come upon them and their's for deserting the cause when the emergency called for their interposition; and that Providence has raised them to their high stations, that they may serve him, and do good to mankind: and will they then neglect the opportunity that is presented to them? That perhaps this was the very service for which they were raised up; and it is preposterous to fear man in doing the evident will of God. Such remonstrances, when urged by men of consistent character, have a powerful effect in exciting the timorous and reluctant to venture in a good cause. They who are called to stand forth boldly in perilous services, have a right to demand the concurrent prayers of all their brethren. And in great emergencies and adversities especially, solemn seasons of fasting, humiliation, and prayer, are peculiarly useful, to prepare the mind for expecting and receiving deliverance from the mercy of God, in a proper manner. Believers may have fellowship with each other in the same duties, who are not able to meet in the same place. They who stir up others to self-denial, should set the example of it: and a winning deportment, a pious conversation, and a holy life, will generally induce others to join us in seeking the Lord, wherever we are placed. Having solemnly commended our souls and our cause to God, we may venture under his protection upon any service, without distressing fear: we are perfectly safe, if he please to preserve us; and should we lose our lives in doing his will, that loss would be our greatest gain. Indeed all dangers are trivial, except the danger of losing our souls. When this is apprehended, the trembling sinner is often as much afraid of casting himself, without reserve, upon the Lord's free mercy, as Esther of coming before the king. But let him venture, as she did, with earnest prayers and supplications, saying, "if I perish, I perish," and he shall certainly succeed in the event. And as the cause of God will at last be triumphant, it is our highest interest cordially to adhere to it, whatever cross we may be required to endure.

NOTES.

CHAP. V. V. 1-3. Esther, having intrusted herself to the protection of God, and put on her royal apparel, ventured into the presence of the king; most probably before the conclusion of the solemn fast, and while the Jews were still engaged in prayer. Her conduct was contrary to law: but the king, by holding forth the golden sceptre, granted her a pardon; and by his subsequent inquiry and promise, relieved her anxiety and raised her expectations, (Marg. Ref.) The apocryphal addition to this book, says, that at first the king frowned, and Esther fainted; and that God then put it into his heart to behave kindly towards her.

V. 4. Esther seems to have intended to make a previous trial of the king's disposition, before she presented her important petition, which immediately tended to ruin his principal favourite. It might also be improper to make her request before the king's attendants; and she meant to do it in the presence of Haman. The delay likewise expressed her respect for the king, whom she reluctantly troubled, because the matter was urgent; and probably she well knew that blandishments, and the exhilaration of wine, disposed him to grant such petitions as he would otherwise have rejected.

V. 8. And, &c. Whether Esther's courage failed her, or whether she had some good reason for this delay; the providential wisdom of God was wonderfully manifested by it, as the event sufficiently shows.

V. 9. He stood, &c. Mordecai had before refused Haman the exorbitant honours which he claimed: but now he "stood not up, nor moved for him," which probably he had before done; for Haman's prodigious wickedness rendered him unworthy even of common respect. He would also show that base man, that so far from abject submission out of dread of his cruel revenge, he had trusted his cause with God, and did not "fear what man could do to him." It seems that at the close of the solemn fast, Mordecai hastened to put off his sackcloth, and to be found in his place.

V. 11, 12. Haman's wife and friends must have before known the particulars of his prosperity: but he loved to talk on these subjects; and the queen's invitations, which he supposed to spring from esteem and respect, was a recent distinction that flattered his pride.

V. 13. The neglect of Mordecai, by Haman's own confession, more than counterbalanced all his prosperity, and marred all his enjoyment. His proud heart rankled with malice and impatience, because this Jew still lived, kept his place, and refused to bow to him. The destruction of the nation was determined on at a distant day; but he thirsted for Mordecai's blood, as an anticipation of that more complete revenge! 'How small a matter will spoil all the satisfaction of those who have arrived at the top of human felicity! Immense riches, glory, and honour, gave not Haman so much pleasure, as he felt pain from one man's disrespect.' (Bp. Patrick.)

V. 14. Zeresh and Haman's friends supposed that he could not relish the royal banquet, if he had not previously gratified his malice by the death of Mordecai. They were confident, that at the first word the king would consent to Mordecai's execution: and they advised the immediate erection of a gibbet for that purpose, that no time might be lost: and in order that all men might witness the death of him who refused honour to the favourite, it must be more than twenty-five yards high! This cruel and foolish counsel was calculated to please Haman; and though night was approaching, the gallows was immediately prepared: but little did he dream for whom it was erected!

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

In those things which must be done, and which require great courage, needless delays should be shunned: and it is best to proceed when our affections are lively, and our faith in exercise. Costly or royal apparel is not the Christian's ornament, being utterly worthless when compared with wisdom and grace: yet on some occasions, and in some stations, it may and ought to be worn. But the great evil is, that inferior persons ape the fashions and emulate the expense of their superiors: and thus they often injure their families and creditors, or lavish that which belongs to the poor, and at the same time expose their own weakness and folly. The best method of prevailing with men is first to prevail with God by earnest prayer; for he can dispose the heart of any prince, or even persecutor, to favour his people, as far as he pleases. Yet whilst we trust in his omnipotent protection, we should be wise as well as courageous: and God will generally teach those who consult him to conciliate men's affections by attention and respect, and Haman, coming early to ask that Mordecai might be hanged, is himself required to confer the highest honours upon him, 4-11. He is extremely mortified; his friends and wife predict his ruin; and he is called in this state of mind to attend Esther's banquet, 12-14.

ON ^a that night ^{*} could not the king sleep, and he commanded to bring ^b the book of records of the chronicles; and they were read before the king.

to watch for favourable opportunities, before they propose important matters. But after all, however largely men may profess or promise, it is best not to ask or expect too much from them. A slight affront, which a humble man would scarcely notice, will torment a proud man even to madness; destroy all his comforts, and sometimes fill him with diabolical rage and misery! Such men delight in boasting of the commendations, honours, and favours conferred on them; every new distinction gives a momentary gratification to their vanity: and they receive every attention as a tribute to their merit, or as homage paid to their superior talents! They invite and even hire men to listen to their praises; and often glory most in those things which tend to their immediate disgrace and ruin! For vanity and vexation are at last the inventory of all sublunary things. All availeth nothing, whilst this is wanted and the other wrong: whilst a beloved child or friend is dead, or an enemy lives and prospers; whilst some are mounted higher, and others refuse the most servile flattery. Prosperity increases insolence and arrogance, which stir up envy and enmity, and provoke affronts and oppositions; and thus the most envenomed resentments, and tormenting passions are excited, and the fair edifice of fancied felicity vanishes like the enchanted castles of romantic poets. May we then seek happiness in the favour of God, in peace of conscience, and dominion over our own spirits; and in that humble holy "love, which is not easily provoked, thinketh no evil, becometh not unseemly, seeketh not her own, rejoiceth not in iniquity, and never faileth," but shall be perfected in the eternal felicity of heaven.

NOTES.

CHAP. VI. V. 1, 2. No reason is assigned why Ahasuerus was not able to sleep: but the Lord so ordered it that sleep fled from him; and instead of calling for the ministers of his pleasure to entertain him, he was disposed to examine the records of his kingdom! It does not appear, that he had any express intention in having recourse to this extraordinary way of employing his sleepless hours during the night: but the only wise God so appointed it. And he likewise led the reader to open the records in that part where Mordecai's important service was written! Had not this circumstance intervened, Haman no doubt would have prevailed in his request against Mordecai; and this would have been extremely unfavourable to the success of Esther's petition for her people, and against Haman.

V. 3. Instead of a reward, Mordecai and all his people for his sake, were actually condemned to die! Probably some recompense had been intended: but so obscure and unassuming a person, who would not cringe and flatter, and who presented no requests for preferment, was soon forgotten by a mighty prince, surrounded by his courtiers and pleasures, and engrossed by a multiplicity of affairs. 'But there was a special Providence in it, that he went without a reward then, which procured it for him most opportunely at this time.' (Bp. Patrick.)

V. 4, 5. 'Haman came early to court, that he might gratify his revenge, and go with more pleasure to the banquet. This was another part of God's providence, to bring him so soon to court, when the king was so disposed.' (Bp. Patrick.)—Even Haman might not enter the inner court till called for.

V. 6—11. We may suppose that Haman was much pleased to be so speedily called into the king's chamber; but his request was prevented, by his advice being asked in a very different business. Probably the king was considering what good preferment was vacant, which might suit Mordecai, whom he should delight to honour and reward as the preserver of his life: but he did not name the person, and Haman was so full of himself that he could not think, the king would honour any one above him, or would delight to honour any one beside him. His excessive vanity, ambition, presumption, and ostentation, as well as the emptiness of his worthless mind, are illustrated by the honours which he chose. He must, forsooth, have the use of the king's own robe, and horse, and crown; one of the most noble princes must be his lacquey and his herald; and by proclamation it was to be made known, what delight the king had in honouring him! Perhaps Ahasuerus understood his meaning, and was disgusted at his exorbitant pretensions: and whilst he peremptorily commanded him to do all this to Mordecai the Jew, he could scarcely help remembering the edict which Haman had obtained against that people. Haman, however, dared not to object or demur; his request for leave to hang Mordecai was adjourned sine die; and he was constrained to become the page to a man, comparatively obscure, whom he hated and contemned above all others on earth, whilst this extraordinary honour was conferred on him! Imagination itself cannot devise a more painful mortification. Indeed it can hardly be supposed that Mordecai was greatly pleased with this unmeaning pageantry, which would confer no solid advantage, but expose him to greater envy. Yet he probably considered it as a favourable presage of Esther's success, and of the deliverance of his people from their malicious enemies. Some learned men think, that the crown-royal denotes an ornament by which the king's horse was distinguished; and not the crown which the king himself wore.

V. 12. Mordecai was no ways elated with the honour he had received, but returned to his place and duty as if nothing had happened. But Haman went home as a condemned criminal, aware of the consequences of this unexpected disaster. If Mordecai had been a person before unknown to Haman, it would have been no real degradation to be employed in honouring him, as the preserver of the king's life; though his pride would have been mortified: but as he was the man whom he had mortally hated, and one of that nation whose destruction he had sought; he must think that this favour indicated the purpose of the king to prefer Mordecai; and consequently foreboded Haman's ruin. For in such a contest, there can be no alternative between victory and destruction.

V. 13. The wise men whom Haman consulted seem to have been astrologers or magicians; and perhaps they pretended to found their judgment on the principles of their art. Yet what hath been observed of the contest betwixt Haman and Mordecai, and the sudden and rapid falls of court-favourites in absolute monarchies; as well as what they must have heard of the wonderful works of JEHOVAH in behalf of his people, were sufficient to convince them that this disaster was the forerunner of more fatal consequences. But they drew no salutary counsel from these apprehensions, and their conclusions were entirely calculated to drive Haman to despair!

V. 14. And hasted, &c. Haman, in the anguish of his heart, seems to have neglected his appointment; and he would willingly have been excused from the banquet, to which he expected to go so merrily: but there was no alternative; he must attend, to hear his accusation, and the judgment in consequence awarded against him.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

We are in every thing entirely dependent upon God; nor can the whole world purchase an hour's refreshing sleep, if he be pleased to withhold it: from him therefore we should seek this solace to our cares, and praise him for it when we enjoy it. But when, by any means, he withholds sleep from us, it is of great importance to be able usefully to employ our waking hours. The cares and duties of our station in society may occupy our reflection, to the exclusion of those thoughts that are vain and injurious: but it is best, when we can think upon God, and his works, his truths, precepts, and promises: and when we can bless him for his mercies, and pour out our hearts before him in prayer; (Ps. lxxvii. 4—6.) The providence of God superintends the most minute concerns of men. Those actions which are the result of caprice, and appear unaccountable, fall in with his wise and gracious purposes, and not a sparrow falls to the ground without him. Gratitude even to man, though commended by all, is practised by very few; and commonly least by those who have most in their power. Pride of rank and birth, a variety of pleasures and occupations, and the presence of agreeable flatterers, combine to induce neglect and forgetfulness of those who have most faithfully and effectually served them; especially if obscure, modest, and unassuming. Yet thus they not only become guilty of the odious sin of ingratitude; but they actually yield the superiority to the very man whom they affect to despise: for he that confers, is always superior to him who receives, an unmerited and unrequited favour. Those qualifications which demand esteem, and those actions which merit a reward, generally expose men to neglect, if not to abuse, in the circles of the great, and in the courts of kings. The instruments of pleasure and amusement, who help men to forget their misery, and to waste their fleeting moments; the forward, the subtle, and the artful; and they who can sacrifice conscience, honour, and honesty, to wit, ingenuity, and politeness, have hitherto always met with most favour from the great. Let us then learn to serve a Master, who will not let the least well-meant service lose its reward. And if any reader should recollect, that nothing hath been done to requite some former benefactor, let him not think that the obligation is out of date: but rather let him study how he may, effectually and without further delay, do that which should have been done long ago: and let him delight to honour his benefactors, if he can do them no other service. Pride, envy, and ambition are insatiable; and every sinful passion grows more exorbitant by indulgence. When a man heartily idolizes his important self, he readily fancies that others equally admire him, and are disposed to do him honour. If any one open his lips in commendation, to be sure he must be the object! if a favour be mentioned, it must be intended for him! if a preferment be vacant, who but he can be thought of to fill it, provided it be not beneath his acceptance!—But “before honour is humility, “and a haughty spirit before a fall:” both God and man delight in rendering the mortifications of proud worms proportioned to their ambition: and they meet with many presages of that everlasting contempt and misery which await them, if not cured of this diabolical vice. They that have flattered them in prosperity will prove miserable comforters in the time of their distress: worldly pleasures will soon become tasteless and even nauseous, to those who have a conscience burdened with guilt or appalled with terror: and even the wise men of this world have often foreseen the ruin of those who have been engaged in the unequal contest with the church of God. But the depth of the believer's distress is the seed-time of his joys; and every victory and comfort is to him an earnest of his final triumph and felicity. The honour which the Father delighteth to confer upon his beloved Son, is a pledge of the security and salvation of all whom he represents, and who commit their cause into his hand: their bitterest enemies shall help forward, and be constrained to witness, their exaltation, and to perceive how "it shall be done to the men whom the Lord delighteth to honour;" and how much their eternal weight of glory exceeds the worthless transient honour of the world! whilst the sight shall increase the anguish and despair of those, who expected to be gratified in compassing their misery and destruction.

NOTES.

CHAP. VII. V. 3, 4. Whilst the king repeatedly urged Esther to make her request, and in language more expressive than before, promised to grant it, though it were to the value of half his kingdom; she, with the greatest modesty and respect, and in the most simple and affecting manner, besought him, that her own life might be spared, and the lives of her people, which were all involved in one common danger. Without complaining of his conduct in any degree, she stated that she and her people had been sold as sheep for the slaughter; alluding to the money which Haman had offered to pay into the treasury for their destruction: she quoted the words of the unrighteous decree, "to be destroyed, to be slain and to perish," as proving that her life, as well as those of the other Jews, was certainly in danger: and she added, that if they had been only sold for slaves, she would not have interposed; though the enemy could never have made up the loss the king would have sustained, by thus oppressing his peaceable and industrious subjects. But some interpret the last clause to mean, that if the sufferings of the enslaved Jews, though extreme and undeserved, had not been likewise detrimental to the king's interest, Esther would have held her peace. The whole speech, however, was replete with natural eloquence, and suited to affect and persuade the king.

V. 5. Perhaps Ahasuerus at first scarcely recollected his edict against the Jews, or was not aware of its consequences; or he did not immediately perceive that Esther referred to it: and therefore he could not conceive that any one could be so daring, as to attempt the life of his queen, as well as the destruction of his subjects!

V. 6. The events and presages of the morning no doubt tended to increase Haman's terror on this occasion. He had found, that the king delighted to honour Mordecai the Jew; he now discovered that the queen was a Jewess, and strongly attached to her people; he had heard the king repeatedly promise to grant her request to the half of his kingdom; and he could not but be aware that his own ruin was impending.

V. 7. We may suppose, that at the moment when Esther mentioned "wicked Haman," as an enemy of her and her people, the whole affair of the edict rushed into the king's mind, and appeared to him in its true colours; and that he was filled with rage, when he reflected how his worthless favourite had seduced him into a measure calculated to ruin his kingdom, to take away the life of his beloved queen, and exceedingly to tarnish his own reputation; and that he walked about in agitation of mind, not knowing what could be done in such an emergency.

V. 8. Haman had prostrated himself against the couch on which Esther reclined at the banquet. His only design was to deprecate, with the most abject submission, her displeasure, and to entreat her to intercede for his life. But the king, being convinced that he was capable of any villany, and growing more enraged by reflecting upon his former machinations; suspected, or professed to suspect, him of having designs against the queen's honour also.— This word sufficiently informed the attendants of his determination; and they directly treated Haman as a condemned criminal, who was never more to see the face of the king, or even the light of the sun, but to be hurried away to immediate death.

V. 9. Harbonah, going to call Haman to the banquet, had seen the gallows, and discovered for what purpose it was prepared. Haman had doubtless been greatly envied for his prosperity and hated for his insolence, in the midst of all the homage that was paid him. But now that the king's mind was evidently alienated from him, all the courtiers were glad to please him and the queen, by assisting in his downfall.

V. 10. It is immaterial to us, whether Haman died by crucifixion, or was strangled, or put to death in some other way before he was suspended on the gibbet: but crucifixion seems to have been a Roman punishment, not in use at this early period. It is enough to know, that he suffered the punishment which he had devised for Mordecai. Nec lex est æquior ulla, quam necis artifices perire sua. 'There is no law more equitable, than that the devisers of death should perish by their own art.'

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The repeated promises even of weak, mutable, and selfish men, encourages us to make our requests to them with expectation of success: much more then should the exceedingly great and precious promises of the unchangeable God embolden us to present many and large petitions to him, in behalf of ourselves and others, and with the full assurance of receiving far more than we ask. If the love of life inspires such earnest and pathetic pleadings, with those that can only kill the body; how fervent and importunate should our continual prayers be to "Him, who is able to destroy both body and soul in hell!" And how affectionately should we pray for the eternal salvation of our relatives, friends, neighbours, and all around us! In sup-plicating the great men of this world, we must be very cautious not to withhold proper respect, or to give needless offence; even just complaints must be suppressed, and that asked as a great favour, which might equitably be demanded as a debt. But when we approach the king of kings, provided we come with humble reverence and uprightness of heart, we cannot ask or expect too much: for though nothing but wrath is our due, he is able and willing to do exceeding abundantly above all that we ask or think. Persecution is as impolitic as it is unjust: nor would the wealth of both the Indies compensate the loss, which must arise to every prince and state, who put to death their conscientious industrious subjects, immure them in prisons, drive them out of their dominions, harass them with oppressions, and tempt them to hypocrisy. Men often commit crimes without remorse, which when described in their nature and consequences by proper language, or pointed out to them in the conduct of others, appear most horrible and atrocious: and when they find upon reflection, the nature and effects of their own heedless conduct, they are filled with anguish and remorse. Yet, alas! their indignation frequently alights upon their tempters or accomplices, instead of producing unreserved self-condemnation and abhorrence. But when such convictions are excited in those in authority, though they do not terminate in true repentance, they may yet produce many salutary effects, by inducing them to punish atrocious criminals, to protect the innocent, and to rectify grievous abuses. They who are most insolent in prosperity, are commonly the most abject in adversity: and the enemies of God shall all be brought down before his people, and made to know his love towards them. When men have proved themselves capable of the most daring and horrid crimes, they have no reason to expect any other but to be suspected where they are not guilty, and to have the worst constructions put upon their most innocent actions. The favour of men is deceitful and precarious: the higher wicked ambition climbs, the more rapid and terrible will be its fall. When haughty favourites, either of mighty princes, or of fickle multitudes, begin to totter upon their slippery eminence, all hands join to hurry them down, either out of envy, revenge, hatred, or similar ambition: and even they, who have most caressed and delighted to honour them, will often as much delight in their misery and ruin. Thus the fear of the wicked cometh upon him;

NOTES.

CHAP. VIII. V. 1, 2. Some of Esther's attendants seem to have been acquainted with Mordecai's relation to her, (iv.) and probably the king knew that she was of Jewish extraction: but he did not know that Mordecai was her own cousin, and had been as a father to her, till on this occasion she disclosed it to him. In consequence he was introduced to Ahasuerus, and preferred by him: and as he had been so good a friend to the queen, and had preserved the king's life, none could have fairer pretensions. The ring with the royal signet seems to have continued with Haman, as denoting the high offices he bore under the king, till he was deposed and condemned; when being taken from him, it was given to Mordecai as his successor. Haman's large estate also, being confiscated for his crimes, was given to Esther, and managed for her by Mordecai; and if that haughty man could have foreseen these events, the prospect would have embittered his life, and even augmented the anguish of his death.

V. 3—6. Haman was dead, Mordecai was advanced, and the queen's person protected: but the edict against the Jews remained in force, and their numerous enemies in every province would endeavour to carry it into execution; and Esther therefore had not obtained the deliverance of her people, which lay nearest her heart. Probably she was sometimes called for by the king: but to show that she was interested in the affair, even more than in her own safety, she again ventured uncalled into his presence to plead for her people. She seems to have been peculiarly earnest and pathetic on this occasion: for she fell at his feet, and besought him with tears to grant her request. It may be supposed, that Ahasuerus hesitated in this perplexing case; as not knowing how to extricate himself with credit from so great a difficulty, and as reluctant to proclaim to all the world the folly into which he had been seduced. But Esther, with great discretion, avoided every intimation that the king himself had issued the decree, and expressed herself as if it had been Haman's forgery. Indeed it had originated in his pride and revenge; his artful insinuations had decoyed the king to give an inconsiderate assent to it: and he had framed it in his own words and to answer his own purposes.

V. 8. The decree against the Jews was irrevocable: but another edict might counteract its operation, and that would also become irreversible; and Esther and Mordecai were allowed to frame one for the purpose as explicit as they pleased. Thus, that most absurd law or constitution made it necessary to authorize a civil war throughout this vast empire; both parties acting by, and against, the king's authority at the same time! The maxim in our government, that no act can be so framed, but that the same authority which enacted it may repeal it, is immensely more suited to the state of human nature: for no human wisdom can foresee all the effects of any regulation, till experience has evinced them.

CHAP. IX.

On the day appointed, the Jews, aided by the rulers, slay their enemies; and among the rest five hundred men in Shushan, and Haman's ten sons, 1—10. The king hearing this, at Esther's request, allows the Jews in Shushan to stand against their enemies on the day following, when three hundred more are slain; and causes Haman's sons to be hanged, 11—15. The Jews throughout the provinces slay seventy-five thousand men, 16. They rejoice with feasting, on the two following days, 17—19. These days are appointed as an annual festival, in commemoration of this deliverance by Esther and Mordecai, and called the feast of Purim, 20—32.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—6.

Many of those who most prosper in the world, would have little alacrity in their pursuits, or joy in their possessions, if they could foresee to whom their riches would devolve, and what use would be made of them. It is however very well when, consistently with justice, that wealth, which has pampered pride and luxury, and increased insolence and oppression, is transferred to those who will improve it to the glory of God and the benefit of mankind. No advancement should render us forgetful of our indigent relatives, or indifferent about the public good and the peace and prosperity of the church. These especially should be dearer to us than life itself: and when we have obtained our requests for ourselves, we should be the more fervent in prayer for our brethren, and in using our influence and venturing all consequences for their good. If we would affect others, we should study to get our own hearts suitably impressed; and in many cases, we may be more importunate in asking favour for others, than we ought to be for ourselves. It is, however, a good plea, when we are praying for the conversion of our children or relatives, to say, 'How can I endure to see the evil that shall come upon them?' 'How can I endure to see the destruction of my kindred?' And it forms an argument equally forcible, to induce us to use every means for their good, with assiduity and perseverance. Bad examples, unjust laws, rash projects, and wicked books, often prove an extensive and durable curse to the world, when the authors of them are removed; and no wisdom suffices to prevent the fatal tendency. And as we must all be answerable for the consequences of our misconduct, this should render us very circumspect, lest guilt should accumulate even after our death.

V. 7—17.

Every regulation in society, however apparently reasonable and beneficial, which does not advert to the fallen nature of man, will, on trial, be found, unsuitable to his real condition, and inconsistent with his best interests: and all provisions made to humour the ambition and passions of princes, will eventually embarrass and ensnare them. We are, however, indispensably bound to adopt every method of preventing the fatal effects of our past mistakes or crimes; even though we should be constrained to proclaim our own folly to the world: and much expedition should be used, when men's lives are in danger, or their minds distracted with terrors. If it was proper that the decree of Abasuerus should be communicated to every nation in its own language; how reasonable and necessary is it, that the holy law and gracious Gospel of our God should be put into every one's hands in his own tongue! They who sow in tears and prayers, may expect speedily to reap with joy. External decorations are insignificant in the judgment of wise and pious men: yet they may properly distinguish those in authority; and whilst they procure them respect from the multitudes who look no further, they should remind them of the duties to which their dignities call them. The preferment of wise and pious men ought to be matter of rejoicing to all: but the people of God have the most cause for gladness. They may expect to be delivered from the darkness of oppression, to enjoy the light of peace and prosperity; and to meet with honour in some measure proportioned to their former contempt. And when believers "have rest, and walk in the fear of the Lord, and in the comfort of the Holy Ghost, they will be multiplied." Nay, the attempts of Satan and his agents to destroy the church by cruel persecutions, have uniformly tended to the increase of true Christians. May the Lord speedily "destroy every enemy who hath done evil in his sanctuary:" may the princes of the earth become nursing fathers to his church: may his people have light, and joy, and honour, a feast and a good day upon earth, anticipating the joy and gladness of heaven: and may Jesus himself reign, by the power of his grace, wherever the sun diffuses his beams, and fill the earth with truth and righteousness! Amen.

NOTES.

CHAP. IX. V. 2. As the Jews were not charged with exceeding the limits assigned them in the king's edict, it may be concluded that they assaulted none, except such as appeared in arms against them; but when they were attacked, they vigorously pursued their advantage. Neither the fear of God nor that of the king, could overcome the desperate enmity of numbers against the people of God, whom they had hoped to extirpate: so that, perhaps urged on by the enraged friends of Haman, they attacked them on the day appointed, in every part of the empire: yet they were every where speedily intimidated, and yielded the Jews an easy and decisive victory.

V. 3, 4. The late decree, and the report which accompanied it of Mordecai's increasing greatness, rendered all the governors afraid of offending him, lest they should fall under the king's displeasure: so that they generally assisted the Jews, which gave them a vast advantage in the bloody contest.

V. 6—10. The sons of Haman seem to have combined against the Jews, by way of revenging their father's death; as the king and Mordecai were out of their reach. At the head of their retainers, they led on the attack in the royal city of Shushan, but they were all slain, with five hundred of their party. As the Jews professed only to defend their own lives, they would not take the spoil of their enemies; and there is no intimation that they injured their families or any individual, who was not found in arms against them.

V. 13. To-morrow, &c. As it cannot be supposed that Esther was actuated by revenge in this request; it is probable she had learned from Mordecai, that Haman's retainers still formed a faction, not only dangerous to the Jews, but to the state; and were prepared to renew the attack on the next day. She therefore desired, that the Jews might defend themselves and pursue their assailants, that the party might be crushed or finally intimidated: and also, that the bodies of Haman's sons might be suspended on the gallows, prepared by their father; to show all concerned, that by assaulting the Jews, they would expose themselves to the indignation of the king.

V. 15. Some think, that many of those slain in Shushan, and in other parts of the empire, were Amalekites, and that thus the prediction, concerning the utter destruction of Amalek, was exactly accomplished.

V. 16. Seventy-five thousand, &c. All this vast number lost their lives through the pride and revenge of one wicked man, but by their own malice and enmity to the worshippers of Jehovah. Thus the power and spirits of 17 On the thirteenth day of the month Adar, and on the fourteenth day † of the same rested they, and made it a day of feasting and gladness.

18 But the Jews that were at Shushan assembled together † on the thirteenth day thereof, and on the fourteenth thereof; and on the fifteenth day of the same they rested, and made it a day of feasting and gladness.

19 Therefore the Jews of the villages, that dwelt in the unwall'd towns, made the fourteenth day of the month Adar a day of † gladness and feasting, and a good day, and of sending portions one to another.

20 And Mordecai † wrote these things, and sent letters unto all the Jews that were in all the provinces of the king Ahasuerus, both nigh and far;

21 To stablish this among them, that they should keep the fourteenth day of the month Adar, and the fifteenth day of the same, yearly;

22 † As the days wherein the Jews rested from their enemies, and the month which was turned unto them † from sorrow to joy, and from mourning into a good day: that they should make them days of feasting and joy, and of † sending portions one to another, and gifts to the poor.

23 And the Jews undertook to do as they had begun, and as Mordecai had written unto them;

24 Because Haman the son of Hammedatha the Agagite, † the enemy of all the Jews, had devised against the Jews to destroy them, and had cast † Pur, that is, the lot, to † consume them, and to destroy them:

25 But † when Esther came before the king, he commanded by letters that his wicked device, which he devised against the Jews, should † return upon his own head, and that he and his sons should be hanged on the gallows.

26 Wherefore † they called these days Purim, after the name of † Pur. Therefore for all the words of this † letter, and of that which they had seen concerning this matter, and which had come unto them,

27 The Jews ordained, and took upon them, † and upon their seed, and upon † all such as joined themselves unto them, so as it should not † fail, that they would keep these two days according to their writing, and according to their appointed time every year;

28 And that these days should be † remembered and kept throughout every generation, every family, every province, and every city; and that these days of Purim should not † fail from among the Jews, nor † the memorial of them † perish from their seed.

29 Then Esther the queen, † the daughter of Abihail, and Mordecai the Jew, wrote with all † authority, to confirm this † second letter of Purim.

30 And he sent the letters unto all the Jews, to † the hundred twenty and seven provinces of the kingdom of Ahasuerus, with † words of peace and truth.

31 To confirm these days of Purim in the enemies of the Jews were broken, and peace and rest were prepared for them. We are not informed whether any Jews were slain on this occasion; but probably their preservation was as remarkable, as the destruction of their assailants. They were indeed placed in the most extraordinary circumstances: but as they were sanctioned in what they did by the king's authority, and stood in defence of their own lives; as they slew none but those who attacked them, and universally declined availing themselves of the king's permission to enrich themselves with the spoil, they must be allowed to have acted in an unexceptionable manner; and were no more chargeable for the blood shed by them, than if they had been engaged in the most necessary defensive war.

V. 20. "Mordecai wrote these things," or the history contained in this book; (as the words most obviously imply,) and not merely the letters afterwards mentioned, as many understand it. It is most probable, that he wrote an account of these interesting transactions, and sent it with his letters into all the provinces of the empire. The contrast betwixt his style, and that of Nehemiah, is very remarkable. The latter is interspersed with ejaculations and pious reflections; the former treats of divine things without any explicit mention of God and religion. The different situation in which the two writers were placed, and the objects that they aimed at in writing, might have as much influence in causing this difference, as their different dispositions. Nehemiah's manner seems in general most worthy imitation; yet in some circumstances men are not to be censured, if they deem it expedient to imitate Mordecai.

matters of * the fastings and their cry. ^{iv. 3. 16. Jon. ii. 2-9.}

32 And the decree of Esther confirmed these matters of Purim; and it was written in the book.

V. 21—32. These verses contain the institution of the feast of Purim, which the Jews observe unto this day. When the second decree of Ahasuerus was published, they had in every place “joy, and gladness, a feast, and a good day.” And when they prevailed in the contest, in all parts of the empire, on the thirteenth day of the twelfth month, they with one common impulse observed the fourteenth as a festival, with joy and gladness. But the Jews at Shushan were on that day likewise engaged in conflict, and the fifteenth of the month was their day of joy and festivity. Mordecai therefore wrote to his people in every place, proposing the observance of both these days annually, in commemoration of their deliverance, by both Jews and proselytes, throughout their dispersions, and to all future generations. And upon the receipt of these letters, the Jews every where consented to the proposal. Yet it seems, that they afterwards grew negligent: and therefore a second letter was written with all authority by Esther and Mordecai, enjoining the observance, which was accompanied “with words of peace and truth;” (30;) that is, with affectionate good wishes, prayers, and congratulations; and with wholesome counsels and instructions. The festival therefore was appointed by authority and by royal proclamation, yet under the direction and according to the mind of the Spirit of God. It is evidently proper to perpetuate the memory of so extraordinary a deliverance: and no doubt Esther and Mordecai did right in requiring the Jews on this great occasion, thus to keep it in remembrance, and transmit the memorial of it to their posterity. It was thus appointed that these days should be spent in feasting and joy, in hospitality and liberality to the poor. But as the prayers, which without doubt attended the fasting of the Jews in Shushan, are not mentioned: so we may be sure that praises and thanksgivings to God at first attended their feasting and rejoicing, though not recorded. And even to this day, the Jews are used to assemble at the time appointed in their synagogues, to read over this book of Esther, and to perform some acts of religious worship: but the feast has long since degenerated into a season of riot and excess. The word Purim signifies the lots, being the plural of the word Pur, in remembrance of the lots cast by Haman, by which the day was deferred till time was allowed for defeating the whole design, and all his tokens were frustrated. The fastings, lamentations, and prayers, which preceded the deliverance, were to be remembered with peculiar joy and gratitude; and some think it was intended, that the thirteenth day should be observed as a day of fasting and prayer, as an introduction to the festival; and the Jews at present profess to observe it as such: but the decree does not admit of this construction. Finally, the decree was added to this book of Esther, in which the history of these transactions was recorded; that the institution might never be forgotten.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—16.

The obstinate enemies and persecutors of the church are often left to act in the most infatuated manner; being urged on by malice, in opposition to the most evident dictates of prudence. For the records of history show, that when the enemies of God’s people “have hoped to have power over them,” it has generally been “turned to the contrary,” and they have gained the advantage “over them that hated them.” Yet, neither observation, nor experience, nor demonstration can subdue the enmity of the carnal mind, which seizes every opportunity of exerting itself: and even the protection of the ruling powers, if not very decisive, has generally been found insufficient to repress the spirit of persecution; though men commonly more fear the displeasure of a king, or of powerful courtiers, than the wrath of almighty God. The aggressor is answerable for all the blood shed in unjust war; provided the advantages gained by those who stand in their own defence in a good cause, be not pushed on with revenge and cruelty: and when whole nations are attacked on account of their religion, they have as good a right to defend themselves, as when the assault is made upon any other unrighteous pretext. But in every case the servants of God should manifest a disposition to humanity and disinterestedness; and frequently they ought to refuse advantages that might legally be obtained—Prosperous sinners often bequeath their vices and enmities to their posterity; the effects of which remain, when their ill-gotten or abused affluence is dissipated: but children will never be ruined by the crimes of their parents, unless they imitate them. The pertinacity of some offenders renders it necessary for the most merciful rulers to use severity: and the enmity and obstinacy of wicked men, will display the justice of God in their final and eternal destruction, when the whole world will know all their crimes. But what dire effects to thousands may result from one malicious, or even incautious, action!

V. 17—32.

When the sense of recent mercies is lively in our hearts, we should hasten to pour out our praises to the Lord. Gratitude to him, when united with liberal kindness to the poor, will sanctify our rejoicing, and render a day of feasting a good day to our own souls, and to our brethren. In reviewing our mercies, we should advert to our previous fears and distresses: we should consider how our sorrow hath been turned into joy; what imminent danger of death or destruction we have escaped; what cries, prayers, confessions, and vows we have made; and with what remarkable circumstances our deliverances were attended, our enemies disappointed, and our comforts renewed. When our mercies are personal, we should be careful that we do not by forgetfulness lose the comfort of them, and withhold from our God the glory due unto his name. When they are very public and remarkable, rulers in church or state should unite authority with admonitions and words of peace and truth, to prevent the memorial of them from perishing, and that all, who shall eventually share the advantages, may join in rendering praise unto the Lord. But, alas! the best institutions are liable to be perverted by human depravity; and to degenerate, not only into a form but into an occasion of sin. Holy joy in God is supplanted by sensual indulgence and carnal mirth: under pretence of celebrating great deliverances, or even of commemorating the mysteries of redemption, professed Christians often behave as if they were the devotees of Bacchus or Momus; and instead of a good day and a feast unto the Lord, they imitate the worshippers of the golden calf, and "sit down to eat and drink, and rise up to play." Nothing more disgraces religion, or stupefies the conscience, than such abuses. May the Lord then teach us to rejoice with that holy joy, which anticipates and prepares for the felicity of heaven.

NOTES.

CHAP. X. V. 1—3. These verses close the narrative, as it stands in the original Hebrew; and are very improperly detached from the preceding chapter. As, however, they here stand, they begin another chapter, which is continued in the apocryphal supplement to this book. The nature of Ahasuerus's tribute, and the acts of his power, are not declared in the sacred Scripture; but the preferment of Mordecai proved no diminution of the king's greatness, or detriment to his subjects at large; and it was peculiarly advantageous to the Jews. (Marg. Ref.) Mordecai neither concealed his religion, nor grew shy of his brethren, though they were generally poor and despised. His authority seems to have been durable; and he was greatly honoured by all his brethren: for he used his power to protect them and promote their welfare; and he behaved towards them with all condescension and affection. The history of the Jews, as recorded in the Old Testament, concludes with this book; and for at least four hundred and forty years, that is, till the coming of the Messiah, the scriptural narrative of that favoured nation is suspended. A compendious view of the most material events which are transmitted to us by other writers, may perhaps hereafter be introduced, in order to connect the Old Testament with the New. It has been observed, that no pagan writer mentions any of the events recorded in the book of Esther: but in fact, little comparatively is known concerning the

of his might, and the declaration of the greatness of Mordecai, whereunto the king ^{*} advanced him, are they not written ^d in the book of the Chronicles of the kings of Media and Persia?

Persian kings, except as connected with the history of Greece, and as recorded by Grecian historians: and it cannot be supposed, that the concerns of the Jews, as dispersed through the vast empire of Persia, would at all attract the attention of that proud nation, who considered all nations, except themselves, as Barbarians; and who seem to have peculiarly despised the Jews as a bigoted and narrow minded people; because they would not conform to any of their varied idolatries, or embrace any of their systems of skeptical philosophy.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The concerns of the despised worshippers of God are deemed more important by the Spirit of inspiration, than the greatest exploits of the most illustrious monarch upon earth. They who enjoy the benefits of civil government, are reasonably required to contribute to the expense of it: but it is happy when taxes are imposed with justice and equality; and the advancement of wise and good men forms the most honourable part of the conduct of powerful princes. Rulers should consult the advantage of all their peaceable subjects: but they are peculiarly required to seek the welfare of the church by protecting it from oppression, and encouraging the worship and ordinances of God. That greatness is truly honourable which is usefully employed: and when exalted stations are filled by those who behave with humility and condescension, and who manifest a due regard to religion, and affection for their inferiors, they will be most likely to escape envy, and to be honoured and accepted by the multitude of their brethren. Contentment, diligence, and fidelity in lower employments, form a hopeful presage of good conduct in more important and exalted situations: and though men of superior talents and excellency may for a season appear to be buried in obscurity: yet, if the Lord hath work for them to do, he will bring them forth to more extensive usefulness. We should be thankful for equitable and peaceful rulers and temporal privileges: but all earthly grandeur is passing away; may we seek those riches and that glory, which endure for ever!

THE BOOK OF J O B.

THAT division of the holy Scriptures upon which we now enter, comprising the Book of Job, the Psalms, and the Writings of Solomon, is called by the Jews Hagiographa, or holy writings; though they include several other books, without reason or propriety. In these parts of the sacred oracles there is greater depth and apparent difficulty, than in those that precede: but the instruction is in general more immediately prepared for use; and the real benefit of perusing the scriptural history much depends upon the degree of our previous acquaintance with the books before us. In like manner we shall read the records of our Saviour's miracles and discourses to edification, in proportion as we have understood the epistolary part of the New Testament; which, though more difficult in many respects, conveys instruction in more direct and explicit terms. We begin with the book of Job, which some learned men have employed much pains ingeniously, but very unwarrantably, to interpret as an allegory. The prophet Ezekiel, however, mentions Job, Noah, and Daniel, as three persons of eminent piety: (xiv. 14. 20 :) and the apostle James illustrates the advantages of patience, by the example of Job, as he had before done his doctrine of faith and works by the examples of Abraham and of Rahab, (Jam. ii. 21—25. v. 11.) No reasonable doubt therefore can remain, but that the narrative of this book is historical truth: though we may safely allow that as the discourses of Job and his friends are recorded in poetical language, their sentiments and arguments alone are transmitted to us, and not the exact words which they used in conversation. But there is no sufficient ground for questioning, whether the transactions relating to the world of spirits, good and evil, actually for substance occurred. It is indeed evident, that this could not be known, except by revelation: but as the book itself records several supernatural visions, and a glorious appearance of God himself speaking from the whirlwind; this creates no difficulty to those who consider it as true, and as a part of the sacred canon. As such, the Jews have always regarded it, though not favourable to Job, because he was a Gentile, and not an Israelite: and St. Paul's manner of quoting it, with "It is written," shows that he considered it as a part of the oracles of God. (Job v. 13. 1 Cor. iii. 19.) A very high antiquity is generally ascribed to this book; nay, some think it is the most ancient work now extant in the world. The long life to which Job attained; the great remains of patriarchal religion in the land of Uz, the worship of the sun and moon being the only idolatry mentioned in it; and no express allusion being made to the Mosaic law, or the wonderful works of God towards Israel; with several peculiarities in the style and composition of the work, give sanction to this opinion. Some learned men indeed perceiving a similarity of sentiment between some parts of this book, and passages in the Psalms and Proverbs, would assign it a much later origin; but wise and pious men will often, without copying from each other, give the same instructions, and coincide in opinion; and it is at least as probable, that David and Solomon alluded to the book of Job, as that the writer of that book alluded to their works, if any intended reference be supposed. Indeed the date of the events it records cannot be exactly ascertained: but it is very likely, that Job was in his first prosperity, between the time when Joseph died, and the appearance of Moses in Pharaoh's court as Israel's deliverer; and the language used by God himself, that "there was none like him in all the earth," seems to give probability to that opinion; for there is no other eminent character mentioned in Scripture as flourishing during that period.—It is not agreed, who wrote this book. Some ascribe all of it to Job himself but the conclusion. Some to Elihu, who in one place seems to address the reader concerning his auditory. (xxxii. 15—17.) But others think that Moses was the author of it. The style has likewise induced an opinion, that it was written in the Arabic language: and perhaps Elihu wrote it in Arabic, and Moses rendered it into Hebrew. The first two chapters are in prose; the style of them is very plain; and they form an introduction to the poetical part, which is in many places peculiarly figurative and sublime, and consequently more difficult to be interpreted. The latter part of the last chapter is an historical conclusion of the whole. It cannot be clearly shown, that this book contains any prophecies properly so called; because the passages which might be adduced as prophetic may also be considered as a profession of faith in the promised Redeemer, and concerning a future resurrection: but few parts of the Old Testament declare more explicitly the grand outlines of revealed truth, nay, even of evangelical doctrine; so that, they who speak of it, as consisting chiefly of natural religion, seem to have entirely mistaken the scope of it.—It opens with an account of Job's piety and prosperity, the charge of hypocrisy and selfishness which Satan lodged against him, and the permission which he obtained from God, to reduce him to the deepest distress as a trial of his integrity. It proceeds to relate how his former friends, witnessing his unprecedented misery, were led to condemn him as a wicked man. This gave rise to a warm controversy, whether heavy afflictions prove one apparently pious to be a hypocrite? In disputing this point, the principles of true religion were argued from by all parties as undoubted truths, and many excellent things were spoken; but the whole had in it a sad mixture of human infirmity. When they could by no means come to an agreement upon the subject, Elihu, who had heard the debate, with great modesty and solemnity interfered; and having first censured the other disputants for groundlessly condemning Job, he proceeded to reprove him for his improper eagerness in justifying himself, by which he had reflected upon the justice of God. Whilst he was discoursing, the Lord himself spake out of a whirlwind, and by a discovery of his incomprehensible majesty and glory, made Job sensible of his presumption, and brought him to humble himself before him as a vile and polluted sinner. This being effected, the Lord justified Job from the charge of hypocrisy, and condemned the conduct and language of his friends: and having decided the controversy in favour of Job, he appointed him to sacrifice and intercede in their behalf, that they might be forgiven. The whole closes with an account of Job's deliverance, and redoubled prosperity, honour, and comfort.—It is a book full of caution and encouragement to the tempted and afflicted; and of warning to those who hastily judge their brethren. It throws great light upon the doctrine of Providence, and upon the agency and influence of evil spirits under the control of God. We see in Job an eminent type of the suffering and glorified Saviour; and a pattern of the believer's "passing through much tribulation into the kingdom of God." In short, the whole is replete with most important instruction: and among the rest we are reminded of the ill effects of acrimonious religious dispute. These four pious men argued together, till, becoming angry, they censured and condemned each other, and uttered many things irreverent about the divine character and government: and having lost their temper, would have also lost their labour, and have been more at variance than ever, if another method had not been taken of deciding the controversy.

NOTES.

CHAP. I. V. 1. The land of Uz seems to have been a district of Arabia, to the south east of Canaan: though some suppose, that it was situated in Idumea, and that Job was descended from Esau. (Marg. Ref.) Others think that he descended from Abraham by Keturah: yet it seems more probable that he was of the posterity of Uz the son of Nahor. He is supposed to have lived before any part of the scriptures were written: but he was acquainted with the truths and will of God, by tradition and immediate revelation. His religion and that of his friends was evidently the same with that of the patriarchs. He was, however, a man of most eminent piety, upright, fervent, and steadfast in religion, and exemplary in his whole conduct; one who regarded the authority of God, revered his Majesty, and habitually worshipped and obeyed him. So that he carefully avoided sin and temptation, and "exercised himself to have a conscience void of offence towards God and man." His subsequent trials tended to his greater humiliation: but he was previously an eminent believer and an excellent character.

V. 3. When the earth was but thinly inhabited, it was easier to acquire land than cattle to feed on it, or to cultivate it: (as the case still is in several parts of America, and in newly discovered countries:) so that Job's wealth is reckoned by the number of his cattle, not by the extent of his lands. He was the principal person in that country, had abundance of every thing which constituted riches among them, and acted as a magistrate or ruler in some respects; though it does not appear that he was properly speaking a king, as many suppose him to have been.

V. 4. The sons of Job, now grown up and settled in houses of their own, cheerfully enjoyed their abundance: and as they lived in brotherly love, they were accustomed at certain seasons to entertain each other alternately. We do not find that Job made one at these feasts: but wherever his sons met, they invited their sisters to join their company, which both showed a proper affection for them, and evinced that no indecency or riot attended their feasting.

V. 5. As Job had, no doubt, piously educated his children, and set them an excellent example, and offered many prayers for and with them; we may suppose that they were well affected to religion. Indeed nothing is intimated to the disadvantage of their characters, and no feasting could be more inoffensive than their's seems to have been. But whilst their pious father could not but behold their harmony and comfort with satisfaction; his knowledge of the human heart suggested a jealous fear, lest their cheerfulness should betray them into some levity or excess, some vain conversation, or some injurious thoughts of God, either tending to infidelity, to dislike of his holy worship and service, or to idolatrous love of worldly enjoyments. When therefore their feastings were ended, as the priest of his family, "he sent and sanctified them," reminding them to examine themselves, to confess their sins, to seek forgiveness, and to prepare their hearts to attend the ordinances of God with seriousness and humble devotion; and he offered a burnt-offering for each of them. Thus he taught them, that even the secret unbelief, ingratitude, and rebellion of the heart merited condemnation, and could only be expiated by the shedding of blood, and the offering of sacrifices, in repentance and humble faith. As he did this continually, we may thence understand his unremitting care of his family, the tenderness of his conscience, his knowledge of the fallen state of man, and the depravity of human nature; his entire dependence on God's mercy in the way which he had appointed, and his believing regard to the promised

Redeemer. The word rendered curse God, in this and several subsequent passages, in its usual meaning signifies to bless: yet it must be understood in a bad sense in this place, and when employed by Satan concerning Job: and it is the same word which is used when Naboth was accused of "cursing God and the king;" and consequently stoned as a blasphemer and traitor. Some think it was substituted instead of the word which more generally signifies to curse from reverence to God, when he is spoken of. Others suppose it signifies to salute, as men do when they meet or part with others, and thus is used to denote, departing from God or renouncing him. But the learned Mr. Leigh brings a quotation from Mr. Selden, which seems more satisfactory, and which I shall therefore translate. 'It is most certain that the verb Barac signifies to execrate or to curse, as well as to bless; and this, as I think, not by antiphrasis as some will have it; but almost from the very idiom of the sacred language, it may signify either way, according to the connexion in which it is used, as among the Latins sacrare and imprecari. For as the first signifies at some times to devote any one by curses to destruction, and at others to consecrate any thing to God; and as we call for either good or evil upon others; so Barac denotes what a man wishes or calls for, with an ardent mind, whether it be salvation or perdition. And when applied to the Deity, it either signifies addressing him by praises and thanksgivings, (which is more common,) or with revilings and reproaches; and the difference is to be collected from the nature of the case and from the context.'

V. 6. (Note, 1 Kings xxii. 19—23.) The holy angels no doubt are here meant by the sons of God; because they love and are beloved by him as his children. They are here introduced to our notice, as on some special occasion presenting themselves before the Lord, to give an account of their late services, and to receive further commands, in delightful obedience to which their happiness greatly consists: and Satan, the adversary of God and his whole creation, is represented as intruding himself among them. Without determining any thing about the place or way, in which this evil spirit appeared before God, or associated with his angels; or whether the transactions of the invisible world be not described in language adapted rather to our conceptions, than to their real nature; we hence learn, that Job's extraordinary afflictions originated from the malice and agency of Satan, by divine permission for wise and

V. 13. Satan knew how fearful Job was that his sons should sin amidst their festivity ; and he seems to have chosen this day for his purpose, that the calamities might be construed into divine judgments. Some think, that this was the birth-day of Job's eldest son ; but it is a mere conjecture.

V. 14, 15. One messenger was spared, to carry the tidings of each calamity, that the sudden and certain information which Job received might overwhelm his mind at once ; and that he might not have time to recover himself from his consternation, or to seek support from God, of which a more gradual information would have admitted. —The servants were at their work, and lost their lives in defending their master's property. The Sabeans were a tribe of the Arabians or freebooters, who infested those regions ; but whether descended from Abraham either by Ishmael or Keturah, is uncertain. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 16. This servant naturally called the extraordinary lightning, which consumed all the flocks of sheep, the fire of God : and the expression aided Satan's temptation, as it seemed to imply that God fought against Job, and was become his enemy. If this fire had destroyed the Sabeans with their ill gotten booty, the divine justice would have been manifest : but that they should escape, whilst pious Job's servants were slain, and those flocks destroyed from which so many burnt-offerings had been sacrificed to the Lord, seemed very mysterious and perplexing. We cannot determine in what manner this and other effects were produced by Satan ; who is "the prince of the power of the air," and is no doubt able, when permitted, to cause any such phenomena. It is generally agreed that the tremendous appearances on Mount Sinai were produced by the ministration of holy angels : and though fallen angels have lost their holy dispositions and moral powers, they retain their natural capacities ; and doubtless could, if they were allowed, produce similar effects : at least it is impossible to prove the contrary, seeing we cannot explain the manner, or ascertain the boundaries, of their operations. But they are absolutely in the Lord's hands, and can only exercise their powers by his permission : and this is the only security of our bodies, minds, connexions, or possessions.

V. 17. The Chaldeans seem at this time to have been an inconsiderable roving tribe ; but they afterwards became a powerful nation.

V. 18, 19. This greatest affliction was reserved for the last, that it might drive Job desperate, when the hand of God seemed to be thus gone forth against him. The loss of one child hath often been more than an affectionate parent could support with decent resignation : but for a whole flourishing family, educated with pious care, and for years insinuating into the affections of his heart ; who were all now grown up, living in harmony, affluence, and credit, and likely to perpetuate his name and prosperity ; to be all cut off at once, suddenly, and, as it appeared, by the immediate hand of God, when they were feasting, and not at their sacrifices ! this, added to all the preceding unprecedented misfortunes, was sufficient to have driven most men distracted, or to have urged them to bitter complaints, or even desperate imprecations. When we have endeavoured to conceive aright of Job's circumstances, comforts, and prospects on the morning of that eventful day ; and of the dreadful change which took place before evening ; and when we realize, from experience and observation, the feelings of the human heart under trials comparatively trivial ; we shall be able to form some faint idea of the immense load which was at once laid upon this eminent servant of God ; and the strength of his faith and grace appear in the manner in which he supported it. And though afterwards, the still accumulating weight pressed from him some impatient expressions, which many have inconsiderately objected to the scriptural commendation of his patience ; yet probably no mere man ever suffered so much and so long, with equal resignation and constancy.

V. 20—22. Job acted as one who felt the weight of his afflictions, but did not sink under them, or lose possession of his soul. He expressed his inward anguish in the customary manner; and behaved, not like one furious or distracted, but with silent and reflecting sorrow. Having rent his mantle and shaved his head, he prostrated himself and worshipped the Lord. He acknowledged that he came into the world naked and indigent, and was no poorer after all his losses than when he was born. He recollected that he should soon leave the world, and restore his body to the earth from which it was taken as the common parent of us all; and that he could carry nothing away with him. He had received all from the unmerited bounty of God, who had seen good to remand his substance and his children, a little before the time when otherwise he must have left them: and his body and soul, his faith and hope, his inheritance, and his God still remained to him. Whoever were the instruments, the Lord was the author of his calamities: he had no heart to revile the Sabaeans and Chaldeans, and others concerned in his losses. He was assured in his judgment, whatever his feelings were, that God had a sovereign right to dispose of him and his as he pleased, and that he had done nothing inconsistent with his infinite wisdom, justice, truth, and goodness. Instead therefore of blaspheming, as Satan had predicted, he praised, blessed, and thanked the Lord, in faith, love, and humble resignation. Thus far he stood the trial most honourably, and did not even utter a single expression, which in any measure reflected upon the divine conduct.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—5.

“In every nation he that feareth God, and worketh righteousness, is accepted of him:” and he will have some even of the wealthy and prosperous of the world to serve him; “for with him nothing shall be impossible.”—When the heart is upright and devoted to God, the general conduct will be holy, and he will be served with the whole man: for the genuine fear of his name will produce habitual hatred of sin, and watchfulness against it. We receive our children as well as every other comfort from the Lord; we ought therefore carefully to train them up for him, and to keep them from the contagion of this evil world: and we cannot but rejoice to see them grow up, and living in amity and comfort. But we should be careful not to set our hearts too much on them; as we know not how soon they may be torn from us, or made the occasions of our deepest distress: we should then commit them to God by constant prayer, and seek his grace to enable us to be submissive, however he may dispose of them. It cannot be expected, but that young people will take liberties in things not sinful, for which their pious parents may have no relish: it is not evil in itself to rejoice in the bounty of Providence, and to use hospitality towards our friends and relatives: and it is a pleasant sight to behold the several branches of a family love each other’s company, and entertain one another. Yet every indulgence disposes us to unwatchfulness and forgetfulness of God: and we seldom feast together in the most friendly and decent manner, without having cause to repent of some part of our conduct and conversation; or at least of the thoughts and temper of our hearts. All this must be washed away in the atoning blood of Christ, or it will rise up against us in judgment at the last day. We have therefore cause for continual self-examination; and after every social interview, we must bestow pains to bring our hearts into due frame for the ordinances of God. Parents should also watch over their children, and exhort, instruct, and assist them, in thus seeking an interest in the great Redeemer, and in preparing to commemorate his death at the Lord’s table. The higher men are advanced in rank or authority, the more important is it that they pay regard to these duties, for an example to their inferiors: but, alas! how few of our nobles and rulers, in this Christian land, imitate Job, in this open profession of godliness, and this strict attention to religion in his family! Yet the consistent believer will attend on these things continually.

V. 6—12.

No man is proved to be a true Christian by being found in company with the children of God, even when they appear before him in his house or at his table. Could Satan even enter heaven, and associate with angels, he would still remain a liar and a murderer, ambitious, subtle, envious, and malignant: and whilst holy spirits delighted in the service of their God, he would be plotting mischief against his cause and people. We should therefore inquire not only, Whither we go, and what company we keep? but also, What our intentions and dispositions are? We ought likewise to expect temptations, and that offences will continue in the church; and should chiefly look to ourselves: for we must every one give an account of himself to God. May we imitate those holy and loving angels, who are “all worshipping spirits, sent forth to “minister unto them who shall be heirs of salvation!” Satan claims this earth as his domain; and, alas! he hath hitherto had too much ground for his arrogant pretensions: and as he continually “goeth about seeking whom he may “devour,” we ought to be always sober and vigilant. But there is a remnant who are rescued from his tyranny, and are the servants of God, in whom he is glorified, and over whom he rejoices. They who are disposed to represent the most blameless professors of godliness as hypocrites or mercenary; to put a bad construction upon harmless or even good actions; and to insinuate some suspicion or objection, in order to detract from the commendations bestowed upon pious and useful men, may easily know whose children they are, whose example they follow, and whose work they do. For they resemble, in every feature, Satan, the envenomed slanderer and accuser of the brethren. It is indeed true, that God will not suffer his people to serve him for nought. Their best interests are secured; no good thing they do shall lose its reward; and he will give them as many worldly comforts as he sees good for them. Yet every believer serves God from love, gratitude, and zeal, and delights in his holy commandments. When called to it, he will part with every temporal possession for his sake: and it is impossible that he, who loves God above all things, should fail of being eternally happy in the fruition of him. But untried faith is not much to be depended on: if ease, wealth, and pleasure uniformly attended piety; if there were no cross, self-denial, or temptation, to serve as a touch-stone, or a furnace, it would be very difficult to distinguish the believer from the hypocrite; and therefore Satan is often allowed to sift and prove the people of God, that he may be the more confounded. He means to destroy, defile, or distress them: but the Lord intends to demonstrate the reality and power of his grace in them, for his own glory and their important good. Little do we know what plots are forming against us in the invisible world; nor are we sufficiently sensible of the number, power, malice, and subtlety of our unseen adversaries. We bolt and bar to keep out a few ruffians of our own species, who might come to plunder or murder us whilst we sleep: but there are legions of infernal spirits, whom we can by no means exclude, and who are able in a moment to distract, torment, or destroy us. Blessed be the Lord, his power limits the operations of these malicious foes: and the protection which he affords to ungodly men against their destructive rage, is a most wonderful instance of his patience and loving-kindness. Yet, as they generally disbelieve or disregard the being and agency of evil spirits, they are led captive by them at their will, and hurried on in rebellion against God. But they who love the Lord, are assured of protection. Their enemies can never break through the hedge which the Almighty God hath made around them: and even when he permits them to be tempted, neither the devil nor his emissaries can transcend the limits assigned them.

we do not know how far they may be permitted to practise and prosper against us. We see in the example before us the extent of their success; and though they are seldom allowed to proceed so far, we should be thankful that they can go no further, and prepare for the worst. One calamity may succeed another, and every one be heavier than the preceding: they may come on us from every quarter with every circumstantial aggravation: we may be entirely impoverished and bereaved; indeed no man can declare all that we may suffer, even when our grand interest is safe, and all things are working together for our good. But if in all our troubles we look to our gracious God, he will repress our murmurs and support us under our afflictions. However unjust the instruments of our correction may be, he is righteous in all that is laid upon us. Our all is from his gift, we have forfeited it by sin, and ought not to complain if he take any part of it from us. We have received all our possessions since we came naked into this world; and we must leave every earthly comfort and advantage when we go out of it: for they were only imparted to bear the expenses of our journey, and to assist our fellow-travellers. Soon will our bodies be conveyed to the earth from whence they were taken, and our souls into the eternal world: and should we be spoiled of all, and bereaved of our beloved children or friends before we depart; we shall not live long to feel our loss, and the hopes and earnest of heaven will support us under it. May we then be enabled to "choose the good part which shall never be taken from us:" may we set our affections on things above, and possess our souls in patience; may we, under our lighter trials, after the example of Job, learn to repress every rebellious passion; to humble ourselves before God; to adore his wise and righteous sovereignty, and to praise him for remaining mercies and prospects: and may we learn by all our troubles, to get nearer to his mercy-seat, in communion with him. Then Satan will lose his aim, and not be able by affliction to prevail with us to sin, or charge God foolishly. And may the malice and power of these our enemies render more precious to us that gracious and condescending Saviour, "who came to destroy the works of the devil," and who, in order to effect our salvation, was willing to suffer from that enemy, far more than Job suffered, or than we can possibly conceive!

NOTES.

CHAP. II. V. 3. Still he, &c. Satan had been permitted to prove Job's sincerity, by the most overwhelming and sudden loss of his whole substance, and of all his children. But instead of cursing, he blessed and worshipped God. Thus he held fast his integrity, and showed the simplicity and piety of his heart. Satan had "without cause," moved the Lord thus to afflict his servant: for there was not the least ground for the charge of selfishness which he had lodged against him; and nothing in Job's character rendered such severe afflictions necessary, either to preserve him from ruin, or to vindicate the honour of the divine government: yet doubtless the Lord had wise and good reasons for his conduct; and Job, as a sinner, deserved worse than any temporal afflictions. The word rendered destroy, signifies to swallow up: and many refer to Job's substance and family; but Satan aimed to destroy his soul also.

V. 4. Satan construed Job's gracious resignation into an evidence of his insensibility; as if he had been destitute of affection for his children and regard for his servants. His life and health were preserved, and he would give any one's skin to preserve his own: he was willing therefore to compound, and part with all to save his life; so that he still kept up his religion, expecting that his other losses would be made up. Nothing could be more unreasonable and spiteful than such an insinuation: yet it illustrates the subtleness of that enemy, who was able plausibly to put a bad construction on Job's most unexceptionable conduct, and to impute to the basest principles, what sprang from the noblest of which the human heart is susceptible.

V. 6. To prove the falsehood and malice of Satan's insinuation, God granted him permission to afflict Job in his body in any way he chose; only he was to save his life. Some think the expression also means, that he was to preserve to him the possession of his understanding; for if he were driven distracted, and in his frenzy blasphemed, it would not be a fair trial.

V. 7, 8. We cannot decide what was the disease which Satan inflicted on Job, but may be sure it was as painful and loathsome as it could be made. Sore boils or ulcers (one of which is often found sufficient to exercise all our patience,) covered Job from head to foot: so that his excessive torture must have been incapable of relief from change of posture: and he would be so offensive that few would like to come near him. So that, being deprived of other relief, he took a potsherd to cleanse his sores: or perhaps when any of his boils began to die away, the itching became as intolerable, as the pain before had been; "so that he took a potsherd to scrape himself withal:" and by this rude and improper treatment, it is likely his disease was increased and prolonged, and one kind of misery alternately exchanged for another. "He also sat down among the ashes:" the Septuagint renders it 'upon a dunghill,' and he is generally represented in that situation: the original, however, means that he assumed the posture of a mourner, and a penitent, and a supplicant before God, according to the custom of those times.

V. 9. When Satan deprived Job of his children, he reserved his wife to be his tempter; perhaps knowing her to be a woman of an impatient spirit, who had great influence with her husband. She had shared the former afflictions with him, but we do not find that she manifested the same pious resignation: on the contrary, it is probable that she was full of hard and rebellious thoughts, though she did not openly give vent to them. But when this additional calamity oppressed Job, she was driven to despair of help, and to upbraid him as preposterous in adhering to his religion, seeing God rewarded his fidelity and resignation with nothing but one dire calamity after another.—The meaning of her advice has been much disputed, as the Hebrew word signifies both to bless and to curse, (as the Latin word sacer means either sacred, or accursed.) But her counsel was evidently suggested by Satan, who spake by her, as by the serpent to Eve, and by Eve to Adam; and it was therefore coincident with his temptation: and both her preface and Job's answer prove, that it was desperate, and not pious advice which she gave him: (Note, i. 5.) It may therefore be presumed that our translation gives the true sense; and that, being herself driven to desperate rage and rebellion against God, she instigated Job to despair and blasphemy, to "curse God," as the author of his miseries, though he died for so doing; or even in order to provoke him thus to terminate his sufferings; or as an introduction to suicide, to which Satan no doubt would tempt him.—It is well known, that the Gentiles, under great calamities, would frequently vent their rage, by curses against the gods whom at other times they worshipped.

V. 10. Considering Job's situation, nothing can be more admirable than this reply. He reproved his wife with firmness, yet with temper: and neither the anguish of his mind, nor the baseness of her suggestion, dictated any opprobrious language. He did not even address her, as a foolish or wicked woman; for he would not for one crime, however great, condemn her as a hypocrite. She spake indeed "as one of the foolish women;" but he would hope it was the effect of violent temptation, and the exceeding distress of her heart; and that she would repent of this her heinous sin. "What," says he, in astonishment at her desperate language, "shall we receive good at the hand of God, and shall we not receive evil?" "Shall we, guilty, polluted, worthless creatures, receive so many unmerited blessings from a just and holy God; and shall we refuse to accept of the punishment of our sins, when we suffer so much less than we deserve, and are yet allowed to hope for a happy event? Rather let us receive the evil also, with patient submission, and even as a pledge of his love, and a means of our good." Thus far he most honourably stood the trial, and appeared the brightest in the furnace of affliction: and the testimony here borne to his conduct, shows that he did not speak the language of passion, as many seem to think; but that of soberness and piety. We are not informed what reception his reply met with; but the temptation was repulsed, and the tempter baffled; and we read no more of his wife.

V. 11. The friends of Job seem to have been persons eminent for their rank in life, as well as for their wisdom and piety. The Septuagint calls them kings, but without proof. Eliphaz is supposed to have descended from Teman the grandson of Esau: Bildad from Shuah, Abraham's son by Keturah; (Marg. Ref.) Zophar also sprang from some of the families, descended from Abraham. For true religion seems to have continued a considerable time in the different branches of that favoured family, even among those who were excluded from the covenant made with Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob. These persons, having heard of Job's great affliction, made an appointment to go to visit and sympathize with him. Their intentions were humane, friendly, and pious; and they had doubtless been the associates of his religion in more prosperous days: yet by their mistake of his case, they not only greatly increased his anguish; but unintentionally concurred with Satan in tempting him to despair, and blasphemy as its never failing effect.

V. 12, 13. Job seems to have been at this time in the open air; when his friends, astonished at what they saw, and perceiving him so altered that they could not know him, expressed their grief by every emphatical token, and burst out into loud lamentations: we need not, however, conclude from the language here used, that he and his friends remained together in the same place all the time preceding their debate, and during its continuance. At proper seasons they came to Job, and sat by him as mourners; but they were so affected by a view of his misery, that they remained silent before him. It is probable, they suspected that his unprecedented calamities were judgments upon him for some enormous crimes, which he had veiled under an hypocritical profession of religion: but they did not choose to augment his grief, by abruptly bringing this charge against him, yet could not use the ordinary topics of consolation. Perhaps they conferred together upon the subject, and agreed to wait and observe his conduct, and to take an opportunity of speaking, as circumstances might appear to them. And perhaps Job suspected the cause of their silence; and his anguish on that account might give Satan an occasion of tempting him to use the passionate language recorded in the ensuing chapter, which confirmed his friends in their harsh suspicions, and gave rise to the subsequent debate.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1-8.

Holy angels are not more unwearied in serving God and in doing good, than evil spirits are in rebellion and mischief: and when baffled in their attempts, they are pushed on, by pride and enmity, to still further disappointment and disgrace. As Satan persists in accusing God's people, notwithstanding the evidences they give of piety and integrity: so will his servants upon earth persist in slandering them, in defiance of demonstration itself. From their father they learn to put an ill construction upon the best actions, and to ascribe them to base motives. The piety of believers is called hypocrisy, their self-denial affectation, their liberality ostentation, their resignation want of natural affection, their meekness want of spirit; and their contempt of worldly pleasure, and dislike to trifling and profane company, are ascribed to want of taste, and a morose unsociable disposition. But the Lord will vindicate the character of his servants: he delights in their constancy and submission amidst trials and temptations, because they glorify the power of his grace. He will therefore, at some times, without any other peculiar cause, give their enemies permission to prove them in various ways. They mean to destroy them; but He intends to purify their hearts, exalt their graces, and enhance their glorious recompense: (Marg. Ref.) And though the trial may be severe yet, it is the post of honour, and the event will be unspeakably happy. The insinuations of Satan

CHAP. III.

Job vehemently curses the day of his birth, 1—10. He complains, because he died not from the womb, and exand his factors are most dangerous when most plausible, and when they are sophistical inferences from undoubted truths. Men are indeed naturally selfish, and prone to disregard all others in comparison of themselves, and their own ease, interest, or indulgence. Hence it is evident we all need an inward and gracious change, that we may learn to love God and our neighbour: and as men will give all they have to save their lives; we should argue, that it is true wisdom to part with our property, nay, with our very lives, to secure the salvation of our immortal souls. But to infer, that all men are alike mercenary, and that the most excellent actions of godly men spring from the same carnal and selfish principles as the most atrocious crimes of the profane, manifests the malice of Satan himself, tends to render the vilest of men contented in their wickedness, subserves the cause of infidelity, and insinuates that all religion is grimace and imposture. Yet who does not often hear such suggestions from those who would not be thought to stand forth the avowed advocates of impiety or atheism? To confute such accusations by stubborn facts, the Lord is pleased to give leave to malice to exert her utmost power, in putting the matter to the trial: in the midst of afflictions and persecutions, he enables the believer to retain his integrity: and whilst the men of the world give even honour, conscience, and their souls, to save their lives; the servant of God renounces all, and even lays down his life, rather than disobey and dishonour his Lord. Thus in innumerable instances have the patient and constant sufferings of godly men confounded, rather than gratified, the malice of their slanderous persecutors; and proved to a demonstration an essential difference betwixt those who are only born of the flesh, and those who are born again of the Spirit. We cannot know how far the Lord, in his unsearchable counsels, may see fit to suffer our enemies to prevail. They may be permitted not only to tear from us all earthly comforts, and to fill our bodies and souls with most exquisite agony; but even to seduce our beloved friends to become our tempters or accusers: we should therefore stand prepared for trials, and rejoice with trembling in every external advantage.—In humbling circumstances a humble deportment should be observed: when we are in great pain and sickness, deserted, insulted, destitute of necessities or convenient attendance, or labouring under a complication of every distress; we should meditate on the sufferings of Job, on his patience, on the love of God to him, and on his happy deliverance; and we should also look unto the suffering Saviour, and compare our light afflictions with his unknown sufferings, “lest we be wearied and faint in our minds.”

V. 9—13.

The temporal comforts reserved to us, whilst others are removed, often prove the sources of our severest anguish. The enemy knows how to suit his temptations to our circiates on the quietness of the grave, 11—19. He longs for present death, and bemoans his misery, 20—26.

AFTER this ^b opened Job his mouth, and ^c cursed his day.

cumstances, and to send them by those persons that possess most influence over us: we should then consider, not who proposes, but what is proposed to us. No temptation is so dangerous to the afflicted as that to despair: when a man is induced to regard God as an irreconcilable enemy, his heart naturally conceives enmity, and vents it in blasphemy; every means of grace is neglected, any crime ventured on with eagerness, and suicide may probably close the horrid career. We should then “watch and pray, that we enter “not into temptation.” We ought not to judge of the Lord’s love to us, by outward events, or present feelings, but should rest our hopes upon his holy word; and we should consider every hard thought of God as a fiery dart of the enemy, which must be quenched without a moment’s delay, by whatever means it has been excited. It is also desirable to possess our souls in meekness, and to answer even our tempters with calmness and reason, as well as with decided abhorrence of sin. None but the foolish will habitually say, that there is no hope in God, nor any benefit in serving him: none but the ungodly can deliberately persuade us to despair, blasphemy, or self-murder. But if any one who has appeared to be a pious Christian, should once, under urgent distresses, drop a hint which tends to such conclusions; we should remind him, whose work he is doing, and whose language he speaks. Did we duly remember our sins against God, we should not wonder, that amidst our many blessings, we had also heavy afflictions: we should rather say, “it is of the LORD’s mercies that “we are not consumed;” and receive the severest of them with thankfulness as well as patience: and thus they would become our richest gain. Those friends, who crush the afflicted believer with hard censures and suspicions, are as real tempters as those who persuade them to blasphemy and apostacy. It is an indispensable duty of the Christian to visit and comfort his afflicted brethren, as he hath opportunity; for it is equally useful to him as to them: and the greatest as well as the meanest should attend unto it, without shrinking from inconveniences or disagreeables. But, alas! we often prove miserable comforters of each other, augmenting instead of alleviating grief. When we are most healthy and vigorous, we should remember to what loathsome diseases our bodies are liable, and that they may shortly become a mass of putrefaction, which could scarcely be known or endured by our most endeared friends. Instead then of being vain of them, or bestowing pains in decorating or pampering them; let us seek for the incorruptible ornaments and unfading beauties of holiness. Let us be thankful for our present measure of health, or the attendance we receive in sickness: and let us look through the grave, to the risen and glorified Jesus, and expect his second coming, when “He shall change our vile bodies, “that they may be fashioned like unto his glorious body, “according to the working, whereby he is able even to “subdue all things unto himself.”

NOTES.

CHAP. III. V. 1. Here the style of the book is changed to poetry, which is adorned by bold figures, according to the genius of the East. For seven days Job's friends had come and sat with him, without speaking either consolation to him, or mentioning their suspicions; but doubtless their distant and reserved behaviour increased his uneasiness. At the same time, we may suppose, that Satan assaulted his mind with all his temptations, to fill him with hard thoughts of God, as if he were severe, unjust, and his enemy; to shake his confidence and hope; and by filling him with horror and dismay, to urge him to "curse God to his face!" His permission seems to have extended to this, as well as to the torturing of his body; provided he did not kill him, or drive him distracted. In this Job was an especial type of Christ, whose inward sufferings, both in the garden and on the cross, are generally allowed to have been far the most dreadful, and in a great degree occasioned by the assaults of the devil in that hour of darkness; and when Job's trial was come to his extremity, we may conclude, that he was deprived of all comfortable sense of God's favour, and filled with dread of his wrath. Without we bring these inward trials into the account, we shall not readily comprehend the change that took place in his conduct, from the entire resignation of the preceding chapters, to the impatience which appears here, and in the subsequent part of the book. But this consideration solves the difficulty: his inward conflict and anguish, added to all his outward sufferings, caused in-dwelling sin to work powerfully, and at length it burst forth in many improper expressions. He long repressed the thoughts of his heart; but at last "He opened his mouth;" not to utter wise instructions, deliberately and gravely, (according to the general import of that expression,) but bitter execrations upon the day of his birth. For he vainly hoped to ease his mind by giving vent to the fire which burned within. The experienced believer, however, who knows that a few drops of this bitter cup are more dreadful than the sharpest afflictions when preserved from inward temptation, and favoured with the sweet sense of the love and presence of God, will not be much surprised, to find that Job proved himself a man of like passions with others, and prone to folly and impatience: but he will rejoice to find that Satan was disappointed, and could not prove him a hypocrite; for though he cursed the day of his birth, he did not curse his God.

V. 2—10. Here we find Job venting his anguish by a variety of curses on the day of his birth, (which is generally celebrated with joy:) because he would thus declare a vain wish that he had never been born. He would have the day and night on which he was born to the joy of his parents, expunged from the year; or at least to be one continued and dreary night. He would have it marked with tokens of God's abhorrence, and by every terrifying appearance; that men might dread its approach, spend it in solitude, and rejoice when it was over: even such a season as the Egyptians experienced during the plague of darkness. He would have it cursed by those who superstitiously marked certain days as ominous; and employed in wailings by those who were engaged to mourn at funerals; or, as some interpret it, spent in horrid incantations, by those who dealt with Satan, and brought him up by their witchcrafts: for the original is literally, "those who are ready to raise up Leviathan." (Is. xxvii. 1.) And all this, because the day did not prevent his being born, and by making his mother's womb his grave, preserve him from his present misery; (Note, Jer. xx. 14—18.) The wildness, absurdity, and impossibility of these wishes denote the tempest of his soul: the cruelty to his mother, whose miserable death should, as he thought, have prevented his wretched life; and the ill-will to mankind, to whom he would bequeath such a dreadful day, may properly be noticed; but such exclamations, being the language of passion, cannot be measured by the standard of reason. They however imply an ungrateful contempt of God's gifts, and rebellion against his will: and they are utterly unbecoming a sinner under a dispensation of mercy, or a believer in a state of grace. But during inward darkness and temptation, Satan so stirs up the corruption of the heart, that the plainest truths and promises are forgotten, former and present mercies are disregarded, future prospects are clouded, and the soul verges to despondency and blasphemy: yet is held back by the counteracting efficacy of divine grace, which subsists and operates, though it does not decidedly prevail; thus the more dreadful effects are prevented, and in time the soul recovers its composure. Doubtless Job was afterwards heartily ashamed of this language: but what may we suppose his judgment of it is at present, in the full enjoyment of unchangeable felicity.

city? Does he now curse the day of his birth? Does he wish that he had never been born? His own reproof of his wife belonged also to himself, though not in the same degree: for on this occasion he spake as one of the foolish men speak, and thus confirmed his friends in their unfavourable opinion of him.

V. 11—19. When Job had exhausted his rhetoric in cursing the day of his birth, he next inquired why he did not die as soon as he was born? And thus he not only murmured against God for sparing his life; but expostulated with those that were present at his birth, as if now before him, for their tender attention to him in that helpless state! for had not they nursed and suckled him when a new-born infant, he should not have lived to endure his present sufferings. The event of his afflictions to himself and to the church, through successive ages, fully resolve his questions, and show for what important purposes he was preserved. But under this temptation he thought of little but relief from present suffering: he knew that in the grave no pain was felt, and for the moment he scarcely looked any further; though in more lucid intervals, he expressed a faith and hope concerning the eternal world. His present misery made him at the moment think insensibility most desirable; and he amused himself with imagining, that if he had died from the womb, he should have lain as quiet in the grave, as the most mighty monarchs, conquerors, or politicians; or as the most wealthy princes, who retained nothing of their acquisitions but a desolate tomb, and were not a whit superior to a still-born infant; there he considered labourers, prisoners, and slaves, as rescued from their oppressors, free as their masters, and at rest from their labour and pain. His words indeed contain important truths: but if exemption from present suffering were all to be expected, there would be little reason to look forward to death with comfort, or to want to be rid of our present life.

V. 20—23. Finding the vanity of his impossible wishes,

Job next complained that he was still forced to live, though weary of life: and he inquired the reason, why light, that is, life, was given to the miserable? He did not mention the name of God, perhaps out of reverence to him, for his better judgment checked the madness of his passion; but he evidently reflected upon him as unkind, in not at once terminating his sufferings by death. He dared not rush uncalled into the presence of his Judge, by an act of desperate rebellion and murder: but he would exceedingly rejoice, if the Lord would dispatch him, and be more glad of a grave than of hid treasures; and he supposed that many others were of the same judgment. He could not suppose that any good end could be answered by the continuance of his life: for every thing in Providence and in the frame of his mind, was so dark and dismal, that he was like a man who had lost his way, or who was so enclosed by powerful enemies on every side that he had no prospect of escape. The tempter seems to have kept the thought of the eternal world from his mind: but the event fully showed, why the Lord continued his life, both for his own good and for that of millions.

V. 24—26. By way of apology for his vehement complaints, Job at length mentioned the excess of his sufferings. Nothing but sighs and groans occupied his time: his very food, which prolonged his miserable life, was mingled with them, and they flowed forth incessantly like waters from a fountain. He was, however, conscious, that in prosperity he had not indulged carnal security: he had feared a change, and watched against those sins, in himself and his family, which might provoke the divine displeasure: yet his solicitude had not prevented his calamities, which equalled the worst of his fears. His former expectation of trials, and preparation for them, should have been a comfort to him under his sufferings: but through the power of Satan and the prevalence of corruption, it appeared an aggravation of his misery.

CHAP. IV.

Eliphaz reproves Job for impatience, and want of confidence in God, 1—6. He states that divine judgments come not on the righteous, but on the wicked, 7—11. He relates his vision, confirming this doctrine, 12—21.

THEN Eliphaz the Temanite ^{a an-^a iii. 1, 2. vi. 1. viii. 1.} answered and said,

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—10.

There is an essential difference between the true believer and the hypocrite; and the former will never finally apostatize or despair: yet under urgent troubles and temptations, the evil of the heart frequently bursts forth in very culpable words and actions. None but the Saviour ever endured the extremity of anguish and temptation, without any abatement of his love, any mixture of sin, or indications of impatience. The pious reader will doubtless recollect seasons when, under afflictions comparatively light, his heart hath risen into the same kind of peevishness, ingratitude, rebellion, and despondency, that Job discovered. Many will with shame recollect, that they have conceived and uttered similar rash and foolish wishes; some will be conscious that half Job's burden would have extorted from them still more desperate complaints; and these reflections should lay us low in humiliation before God. We should also take shame to ourselves, when we consider the folly and impossibility of those things for which we have often wished: and in our sober moments we should meditate on the consequences which would have resulted, had they been granted, to ourselves, our relatives, and our neighbours: and we shall often find that they were unnatural and cruel, as well as impious, and destructive to our own happiness. Indeed the habit of wishing is altogether foolish and sinful. Those wishes, which respect the past, can only express our impatience: and if the object of our desires at the present, or for the future, be lawful, we should make it the subject of our prayers; if not, we should silence ourselves and the tempter, by saying, "It is written, Thou shalt not covet." When our passions overpower reason, the soul becomes as a ship in a violent storm, without compass, rudder, or pilot; and, if it be possible, we ought to cast anchor till the storm subsides. Profound silence, interrupted only by ejaculations, should be observed: we can in such a case do no good, but must get harm by either speaking or acting, though we shall naturally be most earnest in both. Indeed man is born in sin, and to sorrow; and if left to ourselves and the tendency of our own corruptions, without remedy or mercy; it would have been better for us never to have been born; yet even in that case it would have been diabolical rage and enmity, to have charged our guilt and misery upon God, from whom every good and perfect gift, and nothing else, can proceed. But blessed be his name! even the earth is full of his goodness. This present life may be made very tolerable, if we accommodate ourselves to our circumstances, and attend to our duty: and we are under a dispensation of mercy; and may hope for the favour of God and eternal felicity, whatever our former lives have been, if now willing to accept of Jesus Christ, as our Saviour from wrath and from sin. By "giving diligence to make our calling and election sure," we may obtain good evidence that we are born of God; and his children are heirs of everlasting glory: in that case we certainly can have no cause to curse the day of our birth, and if a thought of that kind come in, we should treat it as a temptation of the enemy, and reject it immediately. But what a day, or rather what an eternal night, will that be which awaits impenitent sinners! Condemned to outer darkness, where is weeping and gnashing of teeth; banished for ever from the favour and presence of God; surrounded with horror and despair; employed in curses and imprecations; wearied of existence, and in vain longing for annihilation; and associated with the devil and his angels! That day God will not regard from above, no light will shine upon it for ever. Who then can help feeling the propriety, yea, necessity of praying, "From this destruction good Lord deliver us!" May then all, who read these remarks, take warning "to flee from the wrath to come, and lay hold for refuge on the hope set before us" in the Gospel.

V. 11—26.

If in this accepted time and day of salvation, we in good earnest seek and serve God, we may regard the formation of our bodies, the gift of our immortal souls, the care taken of us in infancy and childhood, and all the Lord's protection of us and long suffering toward us ever since, as intended that we may be for ever happy. Then indeed we may well cease to envy kings or princes, and all the wise and wealthy of the world; who will soon be levelled in the grave with the infant that died from the womb, but who will have an awful account to render of their stewardship before the tribunal of God. We should indeed habituate ourselves to view the grave without terror: for we shall there feel no pain or uneasiness, and be out of the reach of every oppressor and persecutor. But there remaineth a better rest for the people of God; a rest from sin, temptation, and conflict, and from sorrows and labours, in the immediate presence and ineffable enjoyment of God. Thence both wicked men and evil spirits will be excluded, and cease from troubling us for ever; there the weary will indeed be at rest, and the poor slave and prisoner enjoy the glorious liberty of the children of God. Nay, as far as we trust and obey the Lord Jesus, we here find rest to our souls; though in the world we have tribulation. It is indeed far better to depart, and be with him: but we must not undervalue life, though spent in sufferings; seeing it will work for our good at last, and some way or other subserve his glory and the good of our brethren. Let us then learn to keep the eternal world more constantly in view; that we may not be much disconcerted about temporal things.—And should any take up these pages, who are longing for death and tempted to suicide; let them compare their present sufferings, not with the quiet of the grave, but with the scriptural declarations of the state of the damned; which must be the lot of all who die in rebellion and despair, and by an act of deliberate murder. Let them remember that this desperation is the suggestion of the old liar, and murderer from the beginning: let them stop their ears to his temptations, and hearken to the Saviour's inviting voice, and come to him with their burdens and sorrows: and they shall find rest to their souls, and learn to bless God for temporal life as the means of eternal salvation. Finally, in prosperity let us all watch against carnal security; and under trials let us pray for patience: and let us look to him, "who suffered being tempted that he might be able to succour them, that are tempted." Then, though our way seem stopt, and our hope lost for a season; we shall ere long be enabled to declare from our own experience, that they who wait for the Lord shall never be ashamed.

NOTES.

CHAP. IV. V. 1. It is probable, that Job's friends had previously conferred upon his case; and suspected from his extraordinary sufferings and impatient wishes that he was a wicked man; they therefore thought it incumbent upon them to charge this home on his conscience, in order to induce him to repentance: and Eliphaz, who seems to have been the senior or superior of them, undertook to open the matter to him. Thus, when Satan failed of proving his charge against Job, he suggested to his friends this suspicion of his hypocrisy, that they might grieve and tempt him by it! For the argument betwixt Job and his friends was precisely on the same point, which at Satan's instigation was to be decided by his behaviour under affliction; namely, whether he was a godly man or a hypocrite. Satan undertook to prove him a hypocrite by afflicting him; and his friends concluded him one, because he was afflicted, and showed impatience under his extreme sufferings. This we must keep continually in mind, if we would understand the ensuing debate.

V. 2. Eliphaz introduced his discourse with apparent modesty: yet the abrupt manner in which he addressed Job, showed that he was about to censure and reprove him. We would attempt to converse with Job on the subject of his extraordinary sufferings, and his despondency under them: but he was afraid he would be grieved at his words. The case, however, was urgent: for who in such circumstances, "could refrain from speaking?" This intimated, that he thought Job either extremely culpable, or in great danger of final destruction.

V. 3-6. It seems that Job had possessed a singular talent of giving seasonable counsel and encouragement, as circumstances required. He knew how, by animating exhortations, to strengthen and comfort the desponding, that with renewed alacrity they might resume their work. He was also capable of giving suitable cautions to those who were ready to fall into sin or under temptation, and to excite them to resistance. And he had assiduously improved his talent; thus becoming a blessing to many. This Eliphaz allowed; and, along with due commendation, he might very properly have given Job a plain but gentle reproof, for his present impatience and for seeming to abandon all hope. But his application was too harsh, and more suited to dishearten, and even exasperate, one in Job's situation, than to convince and humble him. He certainly made much too light of Job's afflictions, as if not much greater than those under which he had comforted others. "It is come upon thee." "It toucheth thee." He seems to have also spoken too strongly of Job's impatience. He indeed bitterly complained, and uttered many vain and rebellious wishes: but he did not faint; for then he would have yielded to Satan's temptation, and followed the counsel of his wife. And in the question Eliphaz proposes: "Is this thy fear, &c.?" he appears to have expressed himself in a manner suited to give Job the idea, that he considered his former reputation for piety, confidence in God, and integrity of life, as undeserved: seeing he had now cast off all reverence of God and hope in his mercy; and had broken out into the language of despair and rebellion. Some, however, think that he only meant to expostulate with him on the inconsistency of his conduct; and to exhort him to reduce to practice the counsel he had given others; and in this emergency to support the character he had before acquired, but was in danger of forfeiting.

V. 7-11. Most expositors suppose, that Eliphaz intended, in this passage, to bring a direct charge of hypocrisy and iniquity against Job; which he had only insinuated in the preceding verses. ‘Eliphaz, incensed at the complaint of Job, instead of condoling with him, and pitying the miseries which had put him into this agony, and applying fit lenitives to his anguish, bluntly rebukes him for not following the good advice he had given to others in their adversity; and tells him he had reason to suspect his piety, because the innocent were not wont to suffer such things, but only wicked oppressors, whom, though never so mighty, God had always humbled.’ (Bp. Patrick).—Is not this thy storming and fretting at the hand of God a plain argument, that all thy religion, or pretended fear of God, was only upon a confidence that he would still bless and prosper thee?—I have seen and observed that men speed according to their actions, and reap the fruit of their evil doings in evil sufferings.’ (Bp. Hall). Some, however, think that he did not mean to decide on his character, though his language was harsh, and implied strong suspicions; but to show him, that if he was not a wicked man, he had no occasion to despond, as the innocent and righteous were never left to perish; and indeed the counsel he afterwards gives favours this interpretation. (v. 8. 17, 18).—By innocent and righteous, Eliphaz meant believers, godly men, in opposition to the profane or hypocritical. But his questions seem to imply, that no such persons ever were cut off by sudden judgments, so as to perish as to this world: and thus the restoration of Job to health and prosperity, was made the test of his sincerity or hypocrisy. Doubtless the righteous never finally and eternally perish: but righteous Abel had been slain by wicked Cain, and many godly men had been greatly afflicted in this world; so that his general rule admitted of many exceptions. It is also often seen, that “they who plow iniquity and sow wickedness;” that is, who labour to be rich and great by fraud, oppression, and iniquity, meet with a recompense in this world; the breath or anger of the Lord blasting all their prosperity, and consuming all their substance. And though they have been strong, courageous, and fierce as lions: yet they have been strangely defeated of their aim, and brought to ruin with their posterity whom they sought to exalt by cruelty and rapine.

But it is not always so; nor are they the only persons, who meet with grievous calamities in this life: and therefore it was uncandid to insinuate, without evidence, as Eliphaz evidently did, that Job got his wealth by wickedness; and was spoiled of it and bereaved of his children, by the just judgment of God upon him.

V. 12—16. Before there was any written word of God, believers received their knowledge in divine things, either by tradition or immediate revelation: and there is reason to conclude, that when necessary, they were generally directed in the latter way, either personally, or by their brethren. Accordingly Eliphaz, perhaps while meditating on the case of Job, had a remarkable vision, which he supposed to be a divine confirmation of his doctrine: as the instruction was brought to him unexpectedly, and seemed so opposite to the present case as far as he was enabled to receive it. While musing in retirement on various subjects, or on former visions with which he had been favoured, at a time when others were asleep; he was suddenly seized with excessive consternation and amazement, at what he saw and heard: for a spirit or angel passing before him, stood still in his presence. He could not indeed describe what he had seen; but he remembered the words, which were distinctly uttered, amidst the silence of the night. It is observable that the very idea of appearances from the world of spirits is terrifying to the heart of fallen man: sin hath broken off our original communication with it, and we instinctively dread evil from that quarter.

V. 17—21. These verses seem to contain the precise words of the spirit who appeared to Eliphaz. If God should punish those who did not deserve it; the innocent sufferer would be more just than his judge, and man would be more pure or free from blame than his Maker. And as this supposition would be blasphemy; it must be allowed, even when we cannot perceive it, that every one deserves all that he doth or shall suffer on earth or in hell. It is therefore evidently wrong to complain under afflictions, as if we were unjustly dealt with; or to justify our whole conduct before God, who hath condemned us as sinners: and on this ground Eliphaz might have fairly

Eliphaz proceeds to show the close connexion between wickedness and misery, and that man is born to trouble, 1—7. He recommends seeking to God in affliction, by declaring his power and wonderful works, 8—16. He speaks of the benefit of correction; and the privileges of those who daily improve it, 17—27.

reproved Job's impatience; and exhorted him to submit to the justice, and hope in the mercy, of God under his sufferings. Again he was shown, that God put no trust in any of his servants, but even charged his angels with folly, or inconstancy, as the original signifies. Though glorious and holy creatures, they are fallible and mutable, except as confirmed by the Lord: they execute his wise and righteous counsels: but would soon show their want of wisdom, if trusted to manage any part of the government of the world according to their own mind. Nay, compared with the infinite knowledge and wisdom of God, they are chargeable with ignorance, being utterly unable to comprehend the vast designs of the great Creator and Lord of the universe; except as he pleases to unfold them. How much less then may man be trusted! How much more may he be charged with ignorance and folly! He dwells imprisoned in a body of clay, chained to the earth from whence it was taken, and to which it must soon return; as a poor cottage which is mouldering to the mean materials of which it is built, and about to mingle with the dust on which it has its foundation. The feebleness of mankind should also be considered: they may be crushed as easy as a moth, or destroyed by the meanest insect; the destruction of the species is perpetual; men perish from the earth for ever, without any one greatly noticing so common an event. Then all their excellency vanisheth: and they die without having had time to make much observation, or acquire extensive knowledge, compared with that of other intelligent beings: and very commonly without being made wise unto salvation. And shall such creatures pretend to fathom the mysteries of Providence, to arraign the appointments of God, to charge him with injustice, or to venture an opinion on subjects of which they can know little or nothing! The vision was full of instruction: but the use Eliphaz seemed disposed to make of it, was contrary to its leading design. Instead of condemning Job because of his sufferings; he should have inferred, that he and his friends were incompetent to decide upon the case, or to understand the deep designs of God in this mysterious dispensation.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—11.

We ought not needlessly to grieve the afflicted: yet, if we wisely love them, we cannot refrain from speaking those things, which we deem conducive to the good of their souls. In attempting this, however, we should aim to unite tenderness with faithfulness. Just commendations excellently introduce needful reproofs, by preparing the mind to receive them as the result of love, and as forming a striking contrast betwixt different parts of a man's behaviour. But if the application be overcharged; if that be imputed to impiety, which springs from infirmity, it will lose its effect. It requires therefore much heavenly wisdom, to instruct, encourage, and reprove those, who are tempted and perplexed, who have fallen into sins or sufferings, and who are ready to faint, or turn aside, or yield to despondency, through disappointments and discouraging trials. They who possess gifts suited to this work, should be diligent in it, as they have opportunity, whatever be their circumstances or avocations: and the communication from the treasure of wisdom and knowledge, which God hath committed to some, for the instruction and consolation of many, is at least as useful and acceptable as the wealth that is bestowed in providing for the destitute. Yet it is more easy to counsel than to practise: and we all find, that our own arguments, encouragements, and exhortations to others, are insufficient to calm and support our own souls in seasons of darkness and distress. It behooves us therefore to watch and pray, that we may not by our conduct defeat the effect of our instructions, and expose ourselves and the truths of God to reproach and contempt. For, men will expect from us in proportion to our profession; and make fewer allowances for those that have instructed many, than for others. Even pious friends will not always enter into our feelings under distresses and temptations; but will count that a touch, which we feel as a mortal wound. Our infirmities may even give occasion to those of our brethren whom we most love, to suspect and censure us as hypocrites. And this is one of the sharpest trials that can befall a true believer; but we should prepare to meet it. The best are fallible, and often defective in judgment and tenderness; Satan can easily poison their minds with suspicions, and the Lord may permit it for our humiliation. When this is the case, all apparent good in a man's conduct will be ascribed to corrupt motives; and all that is evil aggravated: an irreverent expression, dictated by sudden passion, will be deemed a deliberate casting off the fear of God; an angry word will be termed revenge or hatred; a desponding wish will be construed into rebellion and despair; and the apparent uprightness, and professed hope in God, maintained for years, will be at once considered as presumption, selfishness, or hypocrisy. We should surely be very cautious not to concur with Satan, in thus accusing our brethren, and urging them to renounce their confidence in God. But if it be our trial to be thus suspected and condemned, we need not wonder: better men than we have been so treated; and if we are conscious of sincerity in the midst of our infirmities, the Lord will at length plead our cause, and make our righteousness as the noon-day. Our worst mistakes are occasioned by our deducing false inferences from undeniable truth. It is certain that none ever perished being innocent: that no godly man was ever finally miserable, no impenitent sinner finally happy: that according as a man sows, so shall he reap: and that many tyrants and oppressors, and their posterity, have been wonderfully destroyed. But it is equally true that many righteous men are sorely afflicted through life, and are suddenly cut off, and taken to heaven: whilst numbers of the wicked live long and prosper, die in outward peace, and leave their riches to their children; being "themselves reserved to the day of judgment to be punished." It is therefore as absurd to judge of a man's character by his outward circumstances, as to decide upon it from one single action, which is contrary to the general tenour of his life.

V. 12—21.

The written word of God speaks to us without those terrifying circumstances, which would attend an immediate communication with the world of spirits, and which even faith and communion with God would not enable us entirely to overcome. And we can review it from day to day, that we may fully receive the instruction contained in it. We may therefore be thankful for this method of knowing the will of God; nor should we regret, that we may not expect immediate revelation, and do not witness those wonders which holy men of old did. Yet the knowledge of divine truth is of such vast importance, that no terror could counterbalance the advantage of it: and they who lay aside their Bibles, or forsake the preaching of the Gospel, because they make them tremble at the prospect of their guilt and danger, seem to think it better to feel, than to fear, the wrath of God. Retirement is favourable to our intercourse with heaven: and though we must now judge of every thing by the written word; yet if a dream suggest a profitable hint, we should receive it with gratitude. Assuredly, were our hearts more holy, both our waking and sleeping thoughts would be more pure and heavenly. Revelation from God is not intended to satisfy our curiosity, but to excite our attention to those truths and duties which before we knew not or neglected. Among other important lessons, we are peculiarly concerned to understand the scriptural declarations of the infinite majesty, wisdom, justice, and goodness of God; of the comparative ignorance, meanness, and weakness of the most exalted creatures; and of the guilt, pollution, folly, and frailty of fallen man; the shortness of his continuance on earth, and the future consequences of his conduct here. These truths, if well digested, will cause us to adore with profound reverence the glorious Lord of all, and to abase ourselves in the dust before him: we shall then learn to cease from all dependence on our own wisdom, strength, and righteousness, and become calm and resigned under afflictions: our objections and excuses will be silenced, and we shall be teachable and simple as little children; disposed gladly to trust the Lord's mercy, to accept of his salvation, to yield ourselves to his will, to take the place and do the work assigned us, to prepare for death and judgment; and not to meddle with those deep matters, which are out of our reach and beyond our scanty comprehension. But for want of this knowledge, how daringly do men impeach the wisdom, justice and goodness of God! How do they object, murmur, justify themselves, quarrel with Providence, and reject or explain away, the truths and precepts of revelation; as if they were more wise, righteous, and holy than their Maker! Yet it would be presumption in an arch-angel, to deem himself competent to decide on the propriety of God's unfathomable counsels, or to comprehend his vast designs; much more to find fault with his dispensations, and to dictate what it was right for the Lord to do. He putteth no trust in his angels, and instead of making them his counsellors or submitting his conduct to their judgment, he charges them with folly. How awful then is the pride and presumption of man! How great the patience of God! But let us leave the infidel and the proud reasoner to dispute against their Maker; and the men of the world to heap up their treasures, and obtain those supposed excellencies, or to climb those eminences, from which death will soon hurry them, and they perish for ever, and die without wisdom, whilst scarcely any duly regard it. And let us consider, what we are, where we are, and whither we are going; and act accordingly: that when our clay houses fall into the dust, our souls, having obtained true wisdom in the knowledge and experience of God's salvation, and the excellency of holiness, may mount up to the world of angels and the spirits of just men made perfect: and there at the fountain-head, satisfy without danger our appetite for knowledge, by contemplating the works and perfections of God with unceasing delight, and with further and further discoveries of his glory, through the countless ages of eternity.

NOTES.

CHAP. V. V. 1. Call now, &c. Eliphaz here challenges Job to refute his arguments or the doctrine of his vision, by the example or opinion of any of the saints and servants of God. Let him call forth his evidence who might answer for him in this cause; but to what saint who ever lived on earth would he appeal? Had any of them been so visited by divine judgments, or behaved so rebelliously under afflictions? 'Nay, if an angel should appear to thee (says Eliphaz,) as one did to me, thou wouldst have no other information but this.' (Bp. Patrick.)

V. 2. The wrath and jealousy, or indignation, of God bring destruction on foolish and wicked men, and not on the righteous. Or perhaps Eliphaz perceiving Job to be greatly agitated by his discourse, intimated that his wrath, envy, and fretfulness, would only increase his torment and shorten his days; as they often produced these effects on foolish and wicked men. V. 3-5. In these verses Eliphaz declared the result of his former observations. He had seen wicked men, who foolishly despised the favour and defied the wrath of God, very prosperous for a time: but "suddenly he cursed," (or predicted the ruin of,) "their habitation:" and accordingly he had witnessed the destruction of their families, and the spoiling of their substance by hungry free-booters, notwithstanding all their care to fence it around and preserve it. An allusion was evidently made to Job's former prosperity, to the death of his children by the house falling upon them, and the ruin of his fortune by the Sabeans and Chaldeans. Indeed the most notorious wickedness does not prove, that temporal calamities will befall the perpetrator: and the application certainly was unfair and severe.

V. 6, 7. These verses may be rendered, "For affliction cometh not forth of the dust." "Although man be born to trouble." Man is born to labour and sorrow, as certainly, and from as natural a cause, as the sparks of fire mount upward into the air: yet the measure and duration of them result neither from chance, nor necessity, nor second causes; but from the wise and righteous appointment of God. This is a great truth: but it does not follow, that great afflictions are a proof of great wickedness: for the future world is the state of retributions; and afflictions in this world in general are merciful corrections, and not the effects of vindictive wrath. (17.)

V. 8-16. Whatever Eliphaz suspected concerning Job's previous character, it is evident that he did not mean that his case was hopeless: and the advice here given was salutary and seasonable; though the manner of introducing it implies a censure, and savours of self-preference. Instead of complaints and vain wishes, Eliphaz, if in Job's case, would seek unto God, and commit his cause to him. This, on any supposition, was Job's duty and wisdom: and the subsequent discourse on the works of God was suited to remind him, that the great Lord of all could easily restore him to peace and prosperity. From the unsearchable and wonderful operations of God in the natural world, which are without number, Eliphaz selected his giving rain unto the earth. This is so common that it is scarcely noticed:

12 ^d He disappointeth the devices of the crafty, so that ^e their hands cannot perform ^f their enterprise.

13 He ^g taketh the wise in their own craftiness; and the counsel of ^h the forward is carried headlong.

14 They ⁱ meet ^j with darkness in the day-time, and grope in the noon-day as in the night.

15 But ^k he saveth the poor from the sword, from their mouth, and from the hand of the mighty.

17 Behold, ⁿ happy is the man whom God correcteth; therefore despise not thou the chastening of the Almighty:

18. — 1 Ps. lxxiii. 11. cvii. 42 Rom. iii. 19. — m Ps. xciv. 12. Prov. iii. 11, 12. Jer. xxxi. 19-20. Heb. xii. 5-11. Jam. i. 12. v. 11. Rev. iii. 19.

and yet the manner, in which the water is conveyed, originally from the briny ocean, and distilled in small drops fit for use all over the earth: and the effects which are thus produced; (the earth rendered fruitful, the springs fed, the rivers supplied, and all nature refreshed and purified,) are worthy of our highest admiration, and most ardent gratitude. By this, the barren earth being made to yield a large increase, the poor, and they who are mourning through the dread of starving, are supplied, placed in safety, and even exalted. Eliphaz next noticed especially the surprising method in which the politic counsels of worldly wise men are disappointed by divine providence; and their crafty devices, instead of accomplishing the end proposed, are turned against them; and being carried headlong by some unexpected incident, involve them in utter ruin: so that they are taken in a net, and plunged into darkness or despair, just when they think success is sure: nay, they hesitate, and are bewildered, or fall into fatal errors in the plainest matters, as if they had lost their senses. (Marg. Ref.) By thus infatuating or ruining proud oppressors, God preserves the poor who were about to be devoured, and gives them hope of better days; whilst their oppressors are silenced, confounded, and dismayed, at beholding his work. As therefore such interpositions accorded to the ordinary method of Providence, Job might with confidence expect deliverance, if he ceased from his rebellious murmurs, and humbled himself before God.

V. 17. To take vengeance on a criminal, for a warning to others, and to correct an offender for his own good, are very distinct things, which Eliphaz had not before expressly distinguished. Job's extraordinary calamities had led him to speak as if he had been visited in judgment: but here he indulged a hope, that he was corrected of God for his good; and if so he was a happy man, and ought not to despond under his afflictions. He exhorted him, therefore, "not to despise the chastening of the Almighty." (Note, Gen. xvii. 1-3.) He who appointed his sorrows, was able to destroy and to deliver, as he pleased: he ought therefore to consider the hand of God in them, and thankfully receive them as a token of love, and seek to profit by them. V. 18, 19. Eliphaz next showed the benefits that would result from a proper behaviour under afflictions, and mentioned the happiness of God's people, in language similar to that used in other parts of the old Testament; (Notes, Lev. xxvi. 3, 4. Psalm xci.) He observed that every wound was from the hand of God, and he alone could effectually heal it: as the skilful and tender surgeon cuts and probes in order to heal, and then binds up the wound with emollient ointments. When God smites his servants with afflictions, he heals them with consolations, or by returning ease and prosperity; and when he wounds sinners with deep convictions, he binds up the wounds by a sweet sense of forgiveness, after he hath prepared them for such a mercy. If then Job humbly sought to God under his troubles, he would certainly be delivered: and though he might be tried repeatedly, yet he would still find relief; so that no evil would eventually come upon him. Six troubles, and seven, denote many, one succeeding another. (Prov. vi. 16. Ec. xi. 2.)

V. 20—23. In famine, war, or perils from false witnesses and malicious slanders against his life or reputation, or the ravages of wild beasts, Job might be assured of support and protection, and might smile in the midst of the most terrifying appearances: for God would so order every dispensation that it would be, as if the whole animate and inanimate creation were in league with him.

V. 24. 'Whosoever thou pitchest thy tent, thou shalt find it in safety: and when thou takest an account of thy estate, all things shall answer beyond thy expectation.' (Bp. Patrick.) The word rendered "sin," may mean wander or be disappointed: and perhaps the verse may mean that when the believer goes from home, he may commit himself and family to the care of God, assured that no tempests, fires, or robbers shall come near his habitation: and that he shall be brought back in peace, without losing his way, or being disappointed at his return by finding his family ruined or murdered, or fallen into calamity.

V. 25—27. In case Job committed his cause to God, he might also be confident that his posterity would be prosperous, that he would live long, and die in peace, when full ripe for heaven. These principles Eliphaz recommended, as the result of his own experience and observation and those of his friends, and concluded with admonishing Job to regard them for his good, or to make them his own by a practical use of them. They are indeed good general rules, but they admit of many exceptions: for though the believer is under a peculiar divine protection in his person, character, family, and all relating to him, and should commit all to the Lord's keeping; yet He often sees good to withhold the temporal comfort, in order to confer a spiritual blessing of greater value. Indeed Job's sufferings, so far from being proofs of hypocrisy, were not so much as corrections for any particular offence, but trials of his singular faith, piety, and constancy: so greatly did his friends mistake his case! They spoke general truths according to the light of that dispensation; but they erred in their application of them. The Holy Spirit hath recorded their debate, as infallibly true in point of matter of fact: but we must decide from the general tenour of the Scripture whether they maintained right principles; and whether their arguments were conclusive or not. (xlii. 7.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—7.

It is generally dangerous to deviate from the sentiments and practices of the saints of God: and it is very discouraging to be constrained to act contrary to their judgment. But it is common for men to boast as if believers in all ages and nations were of their mind, when they are far from having even a majority in their favour. And at last, the word of God is our all-sufficient rule, and not the sentiments of any number of fallible men: so that in fact they have sometimes been found right, who have seemed not only to have all the world, but almost all the church, against them. We should watch ourselves, and caution others, against the tormenting and malignant passions of envy and anger; which rule in the hearts of weak and foolish men with most fatal energy, and not only expose them to the wrath of God, but to the temptations of Satan, and to various species of guilt and misery. But we must not rashly represent every gust of passion or agitation of spirit under trials, reproaches, and temptations, as an evidence of a malevolent disposition: for we should not choose to have our own infirmities treated with such severity. We may predict the final ruin of wicked men, as exposed to the awful curse of God, even in the zenith of their prosperity, when all around are congratulating and envying them. Their temporal success will soon vanish: and what is got by fraud, oppression, or cruelty, commonly entails a curse on their families and estates. Yet a man's wickedness must be very notorious, to authorize us to interpret his afflictions, or those of his posterity, into divine judgments upon him. As we are born in sin, and soon run into actual transgression, we are naturally exposed to almost innumerable troubles: but they are all directed by the unerring hand of God, for some wise and righteous purpose; and we should regulate our conduct accordingly.

V. 8—14.

It is easy to say what we would do in trying circumstances; but perhaps we should find it more difficult to observe our own rules than we now imagine. We ought, however, to give proper advice, and to leave the event to God: and it becomes us under all our trials to seek unto him, and to commit our cause into his hands. Whatever difficulties may be in our case, the Lord knows how to extricate us by a thousand ways that we never thought of. All his works are wonderful and unsearchable: we see what is wrought, and can discover his wisdom, power, and goodness in the concatenation of causes and effects in nature; but we cannot comprehend how he works. And too often the great Author of all our comforts, and the manner in which they are conveyed to us, are alike unnoticed, because they are received as things of course. He exalts, or depresses, afflicts, or comforts, as he pleases, with irresistible power, but in perfect justice, wisdom, and goodness. They who are perverse and ungodly, and proud of their abilities and sagacity, are generally made to feel, or to expose, their own folly and impotency. "Professing themselves wise they became fools;" they are often bewildered by their own fancies, and rendered the dupes of their own false reasonings or refined politics; they run into the grossest absurdities, commit the most egregious mistakes, are bewildered in uncertainty in the plainest matters, and grope at noon day as if it were midnight; for "God takes them in their own craftiness, and makes foolish the wisdom of this world." Idolaters and atheistical philosophers of old; and skeptics, infidels, and materialists of modern days, are awful proofs of these truths: and so are politic persecutors and oppressors of God's church, in every age. In vain have learning, wisdom, authority, cruelty, and every device of men and devils united, to subvert the church of God, and extirpate his poor despised people. Their schemes have been frustrated, "their hands have not been able to perform their enterprise;" their "counsels have been carried headlong," and they have been taken in their own snare: they have been infatuated and driven to destruction; and all their successors may expect the same fate. For the poor and despised people of God, though deemed weak, foolish, and defenceless, can neither be overcome nor assaulted with impunity. The church still subsists; the poor in spirit have hope, and expect to triumph in the destruction of their enemies, when the boastings and blasphemies of the wicked will be for ever silenced, or turned into shame and anguish.

"Happy is the man whom God correcteth." We should therefore consider our afflictions as so many kind warnings to examine ourselves, confess our sins, seek mercy from God, and walk more diligently in his ways: we should humble ourselves before him, and neither despise his rod, nor seek help or relief from any other quarter. He alone can effectually remove temporal afflictions, and give peace to the wounded conscience, or relief to the troubled spirit. And when we have found pardon of sin, peace with God, and deliverance from the power of sin, we may without reserve venture our all in his hands. He will provide for our real wants, and protect us in the way of duty, so that no evil can hurt us: and deliver us from all the troubles with which he may please to prove us. Our reputations may be torn by the scourge of the slanderer's tongue; but he will hide us from the effects of such accusers, and clear up our characters in due time. Our habitations, families, and the time and circumstances of our death, may be safely trusted to him: all creatures shall be instruments of good to us, perhaps contrary to their nature or intention; all events will benefit us; and we may smile when others tremble. We may go out and come in, lie down and rise up, without distrustful fear, assured of the special care of heaven, till the Lord see good to call us home. We are not authorized to expect great wealth, long life, flourishing families, or exemption from tribulations: but we are assured that all will be ordered in the best manner possible, and that we shall not be summoned by death till we are ripe for glory, and have lived as long as it is good for us in this world. This has been the confidence, observation, and experience of godly men, in all ages; may we hear it and know it for our good.

NOTES.

CHAP. VI. V. 1—4. Job, conscious of integrity, and displeased rather than convinced by Eliphaz's reasonings, replied, by wishing that his miseries might be impartially balanced against his complaints; assured that he should not have been so harshly censured, if his sorrows had not been made too light of: for in fact they were so numerous and weighty, that he could find nothing adequate with which to compare them; and all his words greatly fell short of fully describing them. In addition to his external troubles, the inward sense of God's wrath and the dread of his almighty vengeance, like poisoned arrows, infested his soul, and exhausted his courage and resolution; or like a powerful army placed in array against him, they cut off his hope of escape, and almost drove him to distraction. Doubtless this was the effect of Satan's temptations, who endeavoured, by every horrible impression on his imagination, to drive him to utter blasphemies, as he had declared that he would: whilst the Lord was pleased to favour the trial, by withholding from him all sensible comfort, and leaving him in darkness and dismay. In this he was a type of Christ, when agonizing in the garden; and when upon the cross he exclaimed "My God! my God! why hast thou forsaken me?"

V. 5—7. In these verses Job intimated, that his friends, being free from trouble and temptation, did no more in being contented, than the wild ass or the ox do, when at ease and plentifully fed. But he must be allowed to vent his anguish by groans and complaints, which were no more to be censured, than the braying of the wild ass, or the lowing of the ox, when destitute of provender. And indeed the discourse of Eliphaz was so destitute of the savour of wisdom and grace, and so unsuitable for the occasion, that it was impossible he should relish it: yet was it all he had to feed his soul upon under his affliction and depression; though at any time he should have entirely disregarded it. Some think he meant, that it was as natural to expect encouraging words under heavy trials, as it is to ask for salt to eat with the white of an egg; whereas the discourse of Eliphaz tended to render his trials more burdensome than they were before. It is, however, plain that he rejected and undervalued the good advice which had been given; because of the injurious reflections on his character with which it had been introduced.

V. 8—13. The passionate earnestness with which Job here requested to die, and the vehement language he used, were very unbecoming. It seemed as if God could bestow on him no greater favour than instantaneous death, in whatever manner it came. This was his chief desire and request, and almost his only one: and it was very rash for him to speak of God's destroying or crushing, or letting loose his hand, and cutting him off, and not sparing him; and of his hardening himself in sorrow, and being comforted in the prospect of immediate dissolution. Alas! he knew not what he said; for who, during a single hour, could endure the wrath of the Almighty, if he spared not, but let loose his hand against him?—Relief from lingering misery was Job's great object: yet he evidently thought of a future world, when he declared that "he had not concealed the words of the Holy One." He meant, that he was no hypocrite; but as he had professed the words of the holy God, so he had believed and obeyed them, as the avowed and real rule of his conduct. But he seems to have spoken too much in a way of self-justification and despondency; and not simply, as stating the ground of his desire to leave this world and go to a better. He added that he had no strength left which could inspire a hope of a termination to his afflictions, except in death; and if he had the strength of stones or brass, his sufferings would soon wear it out; yet his understanding, and the testimony of a good conscience, were continued to him; he knew what he was discoursing of, and his wisdom was not quite driven from him, though his friends despised his words. Though Job thus longed and prayed for death, he did not think himself at liberty to kill himself: a heathen philosopher, or a modern unbeliever, would not have been so scrupulous.

V. 14. But he, &c. He, who does not compassionate his afflicted friend, but reproaches him, casts off his regard to God's authority, as well as love to his brother.—Some, however, understand the verse, as Job's representation of the behaviour of his friends to him; in which sense it may be rendered, "They say of him that is afflicted more than his neighbour, he hath forsaken mercy, and the fear of the Almighty."

V. 15-23. The friends of Job had appeared very affectionate to him when prosperous; so that in his calamity he had hoped for some support and consolation from their visits: but he had been miserably disappointed. This he represented by an elegant simile. In those countries, the ice and snow, melting upon the mountains, at certain seasons filled the brooks with water, so that they appeared like rivers; swelled and discoloured with the inundation: and the Arabian companies or caravans, travelling through the deserts, marked the course of these brooks, which were full of water when it was not wanted: but when in the heat of summer, they were parched with thirst, and deserted thither in hopes of a supply, they found that they were entirely dried up, which filled them with distress and confusion. Thus Job's expectations from his friends came to nothing, and he was ashamed of his former confidence. For when they looked on his miseries, they seemed afraid lest he should become a burden or a disgrace to them; and therefore they treated him with unkindness. But he had not requested them to make up his losses by presents, to rescue or ransom his substance from the Sabeans and Chaldeans, or even to protect him from further violence: for he chiefly wanted consolation to his soul.

V. 24, 25. Job would not have his friends suppose that he was unwilling to receive instruction or reproof. If therefore they would mildly teach him any useful lesson, or point out his mistakes, he would silently hearken. For right words or salutary truths, proposed with conclusive proofs and fair application, are powerfully convincing; but their unfounded suspicions and uncandid censures could not be received as just reproof.

V. 26. Eliphaz had nothing explicit for which to reprove Job, except some passionate words, which excess of anguish had extorted from him, when almost driven to desperation. These ought therefore to have been no more regarded than a sudden gust of wind, which is soon followed by a calm: or, as some understand the passage, the rest of his discourse should not on that account have been treated with contempt, as empty sound. Had Eliphaz calmly showed Job that his passionate language was unbecoming his character for piety, (in the manner that Job had reproved his wife,) he might have submitted to the rebuke; but his intimations that Job had been a hypocrite, entirely defeated his end, and made him think himself excusable.

V. 27-30. In Job's opinion his friends acted as cruelly as if they had oppressed a fatherless child, who had none to defend him; and as ungratefully and unfaithfully, as if they had digged a pit for their friend to fall into and perish. He therefore besought them to be content with his sufferings, which they might perceive to be very great, and not to aggravate them by reproaches; and to favour him by reconsidering his cause, examining it more accurately, and deciding upon it more candidly. If he had spoken any falsehood, they might easily confute him: if he were a wicked man they might detect him. If they could not, let them retract their sentence, and not impute his sufferings to his iniquity; for he was conscious that he was upright in the sight of God, which would be made evident by fuller investigation. He thought he could savour what was true and good, and distinguish what was perverse and profane: and though he allowed he had spoken rash words, he was not conscious, that there had been such iniquity in his tongue as they supposed.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1-14.

In deciding on the conduct of those who seem impatient, we should carefully ponder the number and aggravations of their distresses, which often appear to the sufferer even

CHAP. VII.

Job excuses his desire of death, by representing the vanity, misery, and uselessness of his life, 1—6. He expostulates with God, in a mixture of complaints greater than his heaviest complaints, and beyond the power of words to express. A heart wounded with the fear or sense of the wrath of God, assaulted with sore temptations, filled with horror, and verging to despair, is far more dreadful and intolerable than any external afflictions: yet these pains of hell have often taken hold of the most beloved servants of God. Mere spectators cannot estimate trials of this kind: and but few pious men have wisdom, experience, and tenderness to deal properly with such as are thus deserted, oppressed, and overwhelmed. What then did the Saviour endure in the garden and on the cross, when he bare our sins, and his soul was made a sacrifice to divine justice for us! and what will sinners, who neglect so great salvation, for ever endure in the regions of darkness and despair! "There indeed the arrows of the Almighty are within them, the poison whereof drinketh up their spirit. The terrors of God set themselves in array against them," and they can neither escape nor endure them. They who know no want and feel no pain, may easily be composed, and critically comment on the words and actions of such as are in overwhelming trouble: but their discourses are generally insipid, and often distressing; and they appear worse than they really are: for in anguish a man loses his relish for general truths which before were palatable; he is disposed to be fretful and fastidious; and a little that galls him sets him against all that might comfort him. This should be well considered by those who discourse with persons in great distress: and, except they can command evident affection, sympathy, and caution, it is better to let the storm subside before they speak at all, lest they cause it to rage with still greater impetuosity. Furious passions are peculiarly culpable when they dictate prayers: for men seldom wish or pray for death, except when they are in a rebellious frame of spirit. We should indeed be habitually ready and willing to depart; and indifferent about earthly objects, which may so soon render life itself a burden. But surely we may find something more excellent to request of God, than to be delivered from present suffering. And it ill suits our state and character, to speak of hardening our hearts under the strokes of the Almighty, if he should not spare, but let loose his hand to cut us off. Rather we should humble ourselves under his mighty hand, bow down in submission to his will, hope in his mercy, and entreat him to lighten the weight of his chastisements, and to consider how frail we are. In his favour we may yet have comfort, let our condition be ever so bad: whether he please to take us to heaven, to be with us in the furnace of affliction, or to restore us to peace and prosperity; for "the things that are impossible with man, are possible with God." We may easily see that we ought to act thus under every possible trial: but if we were tempted as Job was, we know not how we should behave. The testimony of conscience to our integrity in our past conduct, as professed Christians, may properly be our rejoicing: yet it may be so pleaded as to savour of pride, rebellion, and despondency. It is also a mercy under severe diseases to retain the exercise of our reasoning faculties: yet sometimes men use them with perverse ingenuity, to argue against their own comfort, and to vindicate their unbelief and impatience! Persons, however, of this description, are entitled to our peculiar compassion: their wounds require healing balm, not sharp corrosives; and if we do not behave with tenderness to the afflicted, we despise the authority of God, and fail of our duty to him.

It is our duty and wisdom to cease from men: the nearest friends and relatives, yea, they who are wise and pious, through mistake and prejudice, often disappoint our expectations. They may be exceedingly kind and attentive, while we are at ease and in affluence: yet in adversity we shall find most of them, like the brook which by the land-flood became a torrent, but in the drought of summer proves a dry channel, and frustrates the hopes of the fainting traveller. But they that trust in God shall never be ashamed of their confidence: for he will be peculiarly helpful to them when all other helpers and comforts fail; yea, though flesh and heart fail, he will "be the strength of their heart, and their portion for ever." When men see their friends cast down, they too commonly fear being involved with them, and exposed to danger, expense, and trouble; and so they appear shy of them, and perhaps unjustly criminate their conduct to excuse their own. Yet sometimes the afflicted suspect their friends without cause.—It is our duty to help others to the utmost of our ability; but it is generally our wisdom to bear our own losses and straits as well as we can, and to avoid becoming a burden to our friends. Prudence therefore requires us, when prosperous, to avoid needless indulgences, and to inure ourselves to some degree of hardship; that if a change should take place, (and we know not what a day may bring forth,) we may not have to say, "the things, that my soul refused to touch, are become as my sorrowful meat."—A wise man will at all times be glad to be counselled, and convinced of his errors, by right words that forcibly rectify his judgment and impress his heart. But most of us are apt to be too impatient, when we hear men argue inconclusively, especially when their discourse bears hard upon our sentiments and conduct. Indeed rash expressions, dictated by anguish of spirit, should not be severely criticised; but though they do not prove men hypocrites, they evince that they are far from humbly acquiescing in the divine will. But it is still more unbecoming to retaliate on reprovers, and to charge them with malice, when perhaps they spoke from genuine love. If, however, we have rashly condemned any one, we ought to review the evidence with impartiality and candour, and to retract our censure if found unmerited. We do not love to be treated as hypocrites contrary to evidence, or the testimony of our consciences : therefore we should not thus condemn others. But it is best to commit our characters to Him who keeps our souls ; and to appeal to that day, when he will “ bring to light the hidden things of darkness, and make manifest the counsels of all hearts, and then shall every upright believer have praise of God.”

NOTES.

CHAP. VII. V. 1—6. Job here represented the life of man on earth, to be like the appointed time of warfare to the soldier, (for so the expression may be interpreted ;) or the labourer's day for his work. The one earnestly wished for his discharge, that he might be exempted from further labours and perils ; the latter looked with desire for the shadows of the evening, when he should receive his wages and go to rest : and why might not he wish for death to terminate his sorrows, and bring him to that happier state for which he yet hoped ? This was the more allowable, as his life was now both joyless and useless, and full of tedious sufferings, without any remission even by night ; for that season of rest to others, was spent by him in agony, and in longing for the dawning of the day : nay, his disease was so noisome, that it made him like a putrid corpse even before his death. All this had come upon him so suddenly, that his happier days were gone instantaneously ; and his remnant of life, which in itself is exceedingly short and transient, was vanishing without hope of returning health and comfort.

V. 7—11. In the midst of this discourse with his friends, Job lifted up his thoughts to God, and mingled some actings of faith and hope with his fretfulness and despondency. He desired the Lord to remember how fleeting his life was at best ; and either to abate his anguish, or release him from it, as he had no hope of seeing any more comfort here. A single look from God would end his days : and as the clouds vanish, and others are formed in their places, so men die and never return to occupy their former stations, but others succeed them from age to age. This does not imply a denial of a future state, or the resurrection of the dead ; but merely describes the condition of mankind respecting this present life. As therefore Job could get no relief from his sufferings, he resolved to relieve his mind by venting his complaints. Indeed if he had poured out his soul before God, that would have abated the anguish of his spirit : but this expostulation only increased his vexation, and seemed to reflect on the divine justice and goodness.

V. 12. Again addressing God, as the author of his sufferings, Job inquired, whether he were like a tempestuous ocean, or some vast whale or unruly monster, that it was needful he should be restrained from doing mischief by such heavy afflictions ; which confined him like chains, a prison, and a guard, that he could not move ?

V. 13, 14. It may be supposed that Satan was the author of these terrifying dreams and visions. Job indeed supposed that they were sent from God to enhance his distress ; but he only permitted them for the trial of his faith.

V. 15, 16. Job was so weary of life, that he would have preferred any violent death to its continuance, while wasted to bones or a skeleton, and filled with pain. Nay, he so loathed life, that he besought God to withdraw his supporting hand, and then he should expire of course : for this seems to have been his meaning.

V. 17-19. Why should the almighty God magnify such a poor worm as man, in thus contending with him, and setting his heart upon subduing him; watching his opportunities of afflicting him; or making continual trial how much he could support, without allowing him a moment's respite? But it is difficult to expound the language of one who spake the dictates of passion rather than of reason, and whose soul was engaged in a continued conflict betwixt temptation and divine grace; which alternately prevailed, and reciprocally defeated the effects of each other.

V. 20, 21. Job would not allow that he was a wicked man and a hypocrite: but he confessed before God, that he was a sinner, and acknowledged that he could do nothing to recover his favour: and he inquired for what cause the Lord marked him out from among his fellow-sinners, as the object of his particular displeasure, by such unprecedented calamities as rendered him a burden to himself? He called God "the Preserver of men." He is the Preserver of our lives, and the Saviour of the souls of all that believe: but probably Job meant "the Observer of men," whose eyes are upon the ways and upon the hearts of all men, to render to every one of them according to their deeds. He was assured also, that God was merciful, and that he could, consistently with his glory, pardon his transgressions and take away his iniquity: and he was very desirous of some token that this inestimable favour was granted him. Indeed he could not understand why God did not forgive him: and he apprehended that this mercy, if not granted soon, would come too late: for that he should, as it were during the night, be laid in the dust, and when the Lord in the morning sought for him to show him favour, he should not be found. These concluding verses contain a very singular intermixture of faith and unbelief, which renders it the more difficult to explain them.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The appointed term of our lives is known to God, but to us it is uncertain: while it continues, we have a warfare to accomplish and a work to do: and our eternal state will be decided according as we acquit ourselves. The believer, by the grace of God, fights the good fight of faith, performs his appointed service, then rests from his labours and receives the conqueror's crown, as a gracious recompense from the hand of his merciful Saviour. When conflicting with sore temptations and burdened with weighty afflictions, we may properly long after the promised rest, and welcome the shadows of the evening, the assaults of sickness, the inroads of old age, and the prospects of dissolution: yet, like valiant soldiers or patient labourers, we should be willing to endure fatigue and hardship a little longer, and not impatiently desire release from suffering. "Wearisome months and years indeed may be appointed for us:" and some eminent servants of God have had such complicated sufferings by day and by night, as to deprive them of all ease and respite: Nay, Satan has been permitted so to harass them with temptations, when asleep as well as when awake, that the horror and anguish of their dreams have given them an idea of hell itself. In such circumstances, it cannot be expected that the tempest-tost sufferer should avoid all improper expressions; and as if this were our own case, so we should need tenderness and forbearance from our brethren; we should learn to make allowances for them, and behave towards them when in distress with candour and compassion. We should also pray earnestly not to be led into temptation; and we may well loathe such an evil world as this, and be unwilling to remain in it for ever: yet life with all its sorrows is valuable, if improved to glorify our God, to serve our generation, and to secure our own salvation. But though the Lord will prove his people, and Satan may tempt them, and they may passionately "choose strangling rather than life;" yet grace will bound the actings of indwelling sin, and preserve them from presumptuous and desperate wickedness; and divine consolations will in general counterbalance outward sufferings. But how wretched is sinful man without the knowledge of a Saviour! Accumulated miseries may render life intolerable, and fears of future vengeance make the thought of death unspeakably tremendous: or being hardened in infidelity or despair, he may be tempted, as "choosing strangling and death rather than life," to plunge himself from temporal into eternal misery. How loathsome may disease render our sinful bodies, even whilst we live! and death will surely return them by putrefaction to the dust whence they were taken. To that state we hasten; our days pass away swifter than a weaver's shuttle; our lives are vanishing like the unstable cloud, and our earthly possessions will soon be in other hands. Let us then despair of seeing good on earth, except in the hope of heaven: let us without delay seek those things which are above, and instead of rebelliously murmuring at the appointments of God, and speaking in the bitterness of our souls; let us pour out our hearts in humble confessions of our sins, and in fervent prayers for forgiveness, and to be spared till fitted for a better world. Whatever may be thought in the hour of temptation, the Lord is kind to his people; and he is doing them important good, when perhaps they are ready to conclude, that he is waiting an occasion to destroy them. His condescension and compassion to such worthless worms are infinite: he could crush them in a moment, and they all deserve it; but he visits, and chastens them for their good, to exercise and prove their graces, to subdue their iniquities, and to restrain them from sin: and his mercies are far more numerous than the stripes of his correcting rod. The Lord is our constant Observer; but he is also the gracious Saviour of all who trust in him: as we can conceal nothing from him; let us plead guilty before his throne of grace, that we may not be condemned at his judgment-seat. And we should do this earnestly; because in the grave it will be too late to repent and seek his face. But if we wait upon him in the appointed way, the tokens of his love will in due time be vouchsafed, and we may then look forward to the hour of death with patient submission and joyful hope.

Bildad blames Job for reflecting on the justice of God, 1—3. He intimates that his children had been cast off for their sins; yet encourages Job to seek unto God, 4—7. He appeals to the ancients, to prove the certain doom of hypocrites, 8—19. He applies the argument to the case of Job, 20—22.

NOTES.

CHAP. VIII. V. 1—3. As the messengers had come one after another to inform Job of his calamities; so his friends followed each other in their censures of him: and thus they inadvertently aided Satan in tempting him to blasphemy and despair. It seems that they were agreed in their judgment concerning the case and character of Job: so that it next devolved on Bildad to answer him, and confirm the doctrine of Eliphaz. Job had spoken important truths, though intermingled with many sallies of passion: but Bildad abruptly and harshly condemned the whole, as boisterous, unreasonable, and pernicious, like a tempestuous wind: and charged him with stating that God perverted justice and judgment, which Job certainly did not mean to do.

V. 4—7. Perhaps Bildad intended to distinguish between the case of Job, and that of his children, in order to show that there was yet hope for him, though not for them: but many think he designed to warn him by the example of sudden vengeance thus set before him. It was however very unfeeling thus to introduce so distressing a subject; and still more to intimate that his children had been cut off for their sins, and perished in them. The language also, in which Bildad conveys his good counsel, seems to imply, that Job's integrity and piety must at least remain dubious, unless proved by his returning prosperity: whereas, had he died of his disease, or worn out many years in penury and pain, it would have been no just impeachment of his character; especially if he had recovered the composure of his mind in submission to the will of God. It was, however, right to exhort Job without delay, to seek and pray unto God; and to encourage him to hope for the recovery of his health and comforts, from the goodness of the Almighty; who was able to raise him from very small beginnings to a great increase of wealth, honour, and happiness.

V. 8—10. Job had slighted Eliphaz's discourse as insipid, and his arguments as inconclusive. Bildad therefore allowed that, by reason of the comparative shortness of their lives, they did not know so much as their fathers, who had had longer time for making observations, and could speak more decidedly from their own heart, or experience. To their testimony therefore he appealed, and desired Job to bestow pains to examine the traditions or records, which they had of their sentiments. Some think that Bildad, being descended from Abraham by Keturah, had especial reference to the eminent piety and prosperity of that patriarch.

V. 11—19. It seems to have been Bildad's design in this passage, to represent by various similitudes the apparent piety and the fading prosperity of the hypocrite ; and to insinuate that this was applicable to the case of Job.—A rush or flag, growing by the river's side, or in a fenny soil, flourishes while well watered ; but when the mire and water fail through drought, it needs not be cut down, but speedily withers of itself. Thus the hypocrite's professed religion and confidence in God are maintained, while worldly interests nourish them ; but come to nothing when these supports fail. Having no root of faith and grace, his piety dies away in persecution or tribulation : and in like manner, God may often expose his hypocrisy by taking away his prosperity. This, indeed, is the proper emblem of all those who forget God ; but especially of the hypocrite. His vain confidence may likewise be compared to the spider's web, spun by the insect from its own resources with great ingenuity, and suited to answer its present purposes : but easily swept away at once, as though it had never been. Thus suitable temptations destroy the hypocrite's religion ; sudden judgments tear from him all his transient prosperity ; and all his endeavours to maintain either his character for piety, or his worldly consequence, by means of powerful friends and relations, prove unsuccessful. Indeed he may be compared to a tree growing in the garden, and striking root even into the rock : yet after a time cut down and thrown aside, while another is planted in its place. Thus wicked men, when they seem most firmly established, are suddenly thrown down, treated with neglect, and sink into oblivion and contempt : whilst others from the lowest stations and of the same disposition come in their place, whose joy in their wicked ways is equally transient and unstable. In general, the hypocrite's religion and the ungodly man's prosperity, having no firm support, are precarious and of short duration : yet, in respect of this present world, every general rule respecting them admits of many exceptions ; and the illustrations adduced were wholly inapplicable to the case of Job.

V. 20—22. If Job were indeed a true believer, Bildad was assured that his prosperity and comfort would return, and his enemies would be put to shame : but if he were a wicked man, he would never be raised above his calamities, but would sink under them. Bildad seems to have formed in his mind a fixed rule of Providence in these respects. Yet there was a fallacy in his reasoning and that of his friends, arising from their not distinguishing between the present state of trial and discipline, and the future state of retributions. Hence they concluded that Job denied the justice of God and the advantages of piety ; because he maintained that in this world wicked men often prospered, and godly men were afflicted.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

Even in religious controversies it is common for men to treat each other with acrimony and their arguments with contempt, to overlook what is evidently good, to make the worst of what is apparently faulty, and to charge horrible consequences upon very inoffensive tenets. There is a way which some have of bringing odium on an opponent's sentiments, by attempting to show that they impute injustice, cruelty, or tyranny to the Almighty, which is calculated to shock every pious mind. Truth needs not, and error ought not, to be thus defended. We are not competent to judge in many cases what becomes the universal and everlasting Sovereign. We should believe assuredly that he is just, wise, and good, in those dispensations which exceed our comprehension ; and wait for the day of the revelation of his righteous judgment to the assembled world. Nay, even when doctrines may evidently be proved inconsistent with the divine perfections as well as with Scripture, it becomes us to treat such subjects with great reverence, modesty, and caution. We are sure God will not pervert judgment : he can have no inducement, and it is impossible in itself. But we must not judge of characters by providential dispensations, or concur with those who condemn the afflicted. When we mention the remarkable death of others, we should not consider them as divine judgments, or decide on the state of their souls, except upon the most undeniable evidence of their presumptuous impenitent wickedness : and it is cruel needlessly to mention a case of this kind, however striking, in the presence of a sorrowing parent or relation. On every occasion, however, waving all topics foreign to the subject, we should exhort the afflicted without delay to seek the Lord by earnest prayer ; and we should encourage them with the prospect of returning comfort from his power and mercy. He will awake for those who sincerely repent and believe : and though their beginning be small, their latter end will greatly increase. We should indeed prepare diligently to inquire into the sentiments of wise men in other ages on these important subjects : especially that we may become acquainted with the experience and observations of those "elders who through faith obtained a good report," and which are recorded for our instruction and warning. And notwithstanding the shortness of our lives, we may thus obtain

CHAP. IX.

Job acknowledges and celebrates God's justice, wisdom, power, and wonderful works, 1—13. He disclaims all attempts to justify himself, 14—21. true wisdom for our present and eternal good. But all human authority, whether of ancient fathers or modern reasoners, must be submitted to that of the sacred oracles.—Forgetfulness of God, and false apprehensions of him, his truth, and his will, render men either hypocrites or openly ungodly. These principles and practices can only spring from a corrupt and carnal mind: and persons of this character will find that their joys and hopes soon wither like the worthless rush, are swept away as the spider's web, and they themselves cut down like the barren fig-tree for the fire. To these earthly joys and false confidences one generation succeeds after another; whilst millions perish without any regarding it! Thus men deceive themselves and each other, and are deceived by Satan: yet every object in nature, when duly attended to, warns them not to lean on such failing supports, to adopt such self-devised expedients, or to rejoice in such perishing comforts. But though the upright soul may be severely tried, God will never cast him away; and at length he shall be filled with satisfying and unfailing joy, to the confusion of his enemies who shall perish for ever. May we choose the portion, possess the confidence, bear the cross, and die the death of the righteous: and in the mean time be careful neither to wound others by rash judgments, nor to distress ourselves about the opinion of our fellow-creatures.

NOTES.

CHAP. IX. V. 1—3. In this answer Job paid no regard to Bildad's severe reflections, but confined himself more to the point in hand than before. He declared, (referring to Bildad's assertion that God did not pervert justice;) that he did not entertain a doubt concerning the righteousness of God in all his dispensations; nor did he mean so, when he denied himself to be a hypocrite: "for how should man be just before God?" Before him he pleaded guilty of numerous transgressions; and should God contend with him in judgment, he could not justify one out of a thousand of all the thoughts, words, and actions of his life: so that he deserved worse than all his present sufferings. But then this was common to him with the best of men, and did not prove him remarkably wicked: though his afflictions were great beyond example.

V. 4—13. Instead of cursing God to his face, as Satan falsely asserted he would, Job set himself to celebrate his perfections and wonderful works. He was as fully assured of God's wisdom and power, as of his justice: he knew that none could finally prosper or be happy, who hardened themselves in rebellion against him. Indeed opposition must be as foolish as impious against him, who, without any previous notice, is able to overturn the deep-rooted mountains, to shake the nations with earthquakes, and to remove or destroy the earth in a moment; who can forbid the sun or stars to shine, or at once extinguish their fires; who spreadeth out the heavens as his canopy, and walketh upon the stormy waves of the sea as subjected to his authority; who arrangeth the constellations of the heavens, and the seasons of the year as he pleaseth; and in short, whose works are innumerable, and incomprehensibly great.—In all these things he acts invisibly, and on every side: he is ever present though unperceived, and can crush his opponent ere he is aware. He can also take away children, wealth, health, or life, and none can hinder him, or call him to account: and if his anger be not pacified, the stoutest and proudest helpers must sink under his powerful vengeance. It is madness therefore for a worm to resist his will. There seems to be no allusion in this passage to any of the miraculous displays of the divine power recorded in Scripture, except it be to the convulsions of the deluge.—The names of the constellations, Arcturus, Orion, and Pleiades, are taken from the Greek version, and are supposed to correspond with the original words, Hash or Ash, Chesil and Kima ; and “ the chambers of the south,” may mean those stars, which are seen in the southern hemisphere, or those which only appear in the south at certain seasons of the year.

V. 14—21. Indeed, if none could justify himself before God, or withstand his power; Job, in his present abject condition, thought himself peculiarly unfit for such a bold attempt: for his mind was so confused, that he could not select apt words to express his meaning in what he desired to say. Even if he were completely righteous, he would rather supplicate the favour, than claim deliverance from the justice, of his Judge. Indeed he was so entirely disheartened, that an immediate answer to his prayer could not embolden him to hope that God would return to him in mercy. For though he was conscious he had not given cause for it by any gross wickedness or hypocrisy; yet God had so overwhelmed him with the tempest of his wrath; had so wounded him in body and soul, with reiterated strokes, without giving him the least breathing time; and had so filled him with bitterness, that he could not but regard him as an enemy. At the same time, he knew that it was impossible to resist his almighty power, or to escape his omnipresence: and it would be equally absurd to think of deciding the controversy by a judicial trial: for who had authority to act as judge, and to appoint the time and place of hearing? Nay, were that possible, it would be in vain: for, if there was no other guilt chargeable upon him, his attempt to justify himself before God, and every argument that he should use in such a cause, would condemn him as a perverse and rebellious creature. And if he knew no ill of himself, yet he would not think himself free from criminality: for he did not know his own soul, as his heart-searching Judge did : and therefore he would despise his own life ; and submit to any sentence, rather than contend against the Majesty of heaven.—There is in this passage a great deal of truth, as well as sound reasoning and honourable thoughts of God : yet there is also a considerable tincture of unbelief and despondency. Some hope in the divine mercy seems implied : but that attribute is not mentioned, and Job was only just supported from sinking into despair.—They that know something of Satan's dark temptations, when his suggestions fill the soul with horrible thoughts of God, and tend to subvert the foundations of hope, will, from their own distressing experience, better understand Job's meaning, than from any unexperienced commentator. Had they at such times been urged to speak, their discourse would have contained a similar conflict betwixt hard and honourable thoughts of God ; betwixt gloomy despondency and feeble hope ; and betwixt rebellious murmurs, and a consciousness that they ought to submit, and a desire so to do.

V. 22—24. Here Job lays down the precise subject, upon which he was at issue with his friends, and on which the Lord at length decided in his favour. He maintained against them, that in the dispensations of Providence in this world, there is no exact discrimination betwixt the righteous and the wicked; that when God scourges guilty nations, by war, famine, or pestilence, they who are comparatively innocent and truly pious, are often involved in the common calamity; and that in such sudden desolations the Lord does not wait, so to speak, to try their causes: or the scourge is figuratively spoken of as laughing at distinctions in the characters of the sufferers. Indeed the earth is mainly possessed and governed by wicked men: and the judges of it are commonly blinded by their lusts or hood-winked by bribery, so that they frequently oppress and persecute the righteous. Yet God gives them their power, and allows them to prosper in their crimes, by which they are still further blinded and hardened. And who is he, that can deny these facts, which prove that this is not a state of exact retribution?

V. 25—35. Here Job again renewed his complaints, with the same incoherency and conflict of contending principles as before. He regarded his life as having suddenly come to a wretched end; and with speed that surpassed that of the fleetest horse on which the messenger of important tidings travels express, that of the swiftest ships, and even that of the eagle hasting to the prey. All his efforts to rise superior to the tumult of his passions were unavailing; he could not but fear even worse than he felt; and as he was indeed a sinner, and his friends condemned him, he was alarmed lest God should finally reject him. If indeed he were a wicked man, it would be labour in vain to vindicate his character: for when he had done all in his power for that purpose; God would detect his secret iniquities, and thus thrust him as it were into the mire, till his very garments rendered him abhorred. Nay, though he were not a wicked man, yet the discovery of all his former sins, and of the defects of his present obedience, would show him to be, “as an unclean thing, and his righteousness as filthy rags.” Indeed his loathsome disease, and his other afflictions, were interpreted by his friends as proof of his guilt, and as God’s plunging him in a ditch and rendering him abominable; notwithstanding all the proofs he could give of his integrity. So that there was nothing to be attempted in so unequal a contest: there was no day’s-man or umpire, to decide upon the merits of the cause, whose authority might induce both parties to abide by his sentence: and he was so confused and terrified that he could not make the best of his cause. If his afflictions and terrors were removed, he could then speak without fear: but as the case now stood, he might as well hold his peace.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—15.

The justice, wisdom, truth, and goodness of God must be taken for granted, whatever sentiments we defend or oppose; for “shall not the Judge of all the earth do right?” But “how should man be just before God?” If he enter into judgment with us according to his holy law, not one action in a thousand can stand the test. The wisdom, power, and sovereignty of God are displayed in the works of creation and providence: we may collect what he can do from what he has done: and when these subjects are duly considered, they who harden themselves against him in presumptuous wickedness, appear to be perfectly infatuated. How can they, who despise the favour and defy the vengeance of the Almighty, expect to prosper, or to escape final misery? But they are no less so, who proudly attempt to justify themselves before that God, who possesses infinite purity and justice, and knows us better than we know ourselves. He will prove every indictment which he hath brought, and vindicate every sentence which he hath denounced against any of his creatures. It is therefore our only wisdom to supplicate mercy, and not to demand justice, from our Judge. Every attempt to establish our own righteousness forms an additional demonstration of our pride, perverseness, and rebellion. The Lord can produce against us innumerable transgressions which have escaped our notice or recollection: he views us with an impartial eye, whilst we flatter ourselves in our own sight: he sees our iniquity to be hateful, when we are attempting to palliate it. If then we know nothing by ourselves, we are “not thereby justified:” and it is far better to submit to his righteousness, than to argue either against the sentence of his law or the appointments of his providence, which unitedly testify against us. In like manner, labour to vindicate our character, if indeed we are hypocrites, must be in vain: we shall soon appear as if newly plunged in the mire, and be exposed to shame and condemnation, without being able to plead any thing in our own behalf. But if consciously sincere, we may humbly maintain our integrity before men; yet it is often lost labour, except as “by well doing we put to silence the ignorance of foolish men.” And it is commonly best to leave our cause with God, and patiently to bear the unjust suspicions of our brethren, till he sees good to remove the painful trial.

V. 16—35.

We should be very careful not to be offended either by the tribulations we meet with, or the prosperity of the wicked: they have their short-lived pleasures, we our transient sorrows. Our lives are speeding away with unobserved swiftness, and soon their joys and our tears will be for ever done away. Yet under severe trials and sharp temptations, it is very difficult to repress murmurs, to keep out

CHAP. X.

Job entreats God to show wherefore he contended with him; and pleads for compassion as from his Creator, 1—13. He states, that his sins were strictly marked and rigorously punished, 14—17. He repines, that he had been born, or had not died immediately after: and craves respite from pain to prepare for death, 18—22.

M^aY^a soul is * weary of my life; ^b I will leave my complaint upon myself; ^c I will speak in the bitterness of my soul.

2 I will say unto God, ^d Do not condemn me; ^e shew me wherefore thou contendest with me.

hard thoughts of God, or to hold fast our confidence in him. When, through Satan's influence on the mind, the Lord appears as an enemy; when his power and justice are more distinguishable than his mercy, and when a sense of his displeasure, and slavish fears of condemnation preponderate, the soul even of a believer is filled with inexpressible confusion, and verges to melancholy and despair. It is easy to counsel those who are in such a case: but who can then practise as he ought? Every object enhances terror; every topic suggests new disquietude; the trembling and tempted soul forgets, or dares not appropriate, the promises; every precept, threatening, warning, or example, seems to be pointed against him; and he scarcely ventures to approach, or knows not how to speak, before the mercy-seat, where once he communed with his God in the spirit of adoption, with confidence and comfort. "This is indeed the time of Jacob's trouble, but he shall be delivered out of it." We may be thankful, if we have not known these waves and billows of dire temptations; yet we shall scarcely know how to sympathize with those that are conflicting with them, or to make proper allowances for them. But, poor tempest-tossed soul, consider Job, and notice that others have passed this dreadful gulph before thee; and though they could not believe that God would hear or deliver them any more; yet he rebuked the storm, and brought them to the desired haven. And look to Jesus, who though free from sin, once "suffered being tempted, that he might be able to succour such as are tempted." Resist then the devil, "steadfast in the faith;" give not place to hard thoughts of God or desperate conclusions about thyself; repress as much as possible every rising passionate wish or expression. Come to him who invites the weary and heavy laden; and hath both promised in no wise to cast out those who come, but to give rest to their souls: plead guilty; cast thyself upon unmerited mercy, as if this were thy first approach to a forgiving God, without deciding any thing about thy former experience or character: acknowledge that thy sufferings are less than thy sins have deserved: cry for repentance, for faith, for patience, for inward support; and wait thus at mercy's gate. There can indeed be no superior, who as umpire, can lay his hand on both parties: yet remember that there is an appointed Mediator, "an Advocate with the Father," who "is able to save to the uttermost all them who come to God by him;" seeing he ever liveth to make intercession for "them," according to the will of God. And that those who believe on him, are washed and justified from all their sins: and will soon be saved from all their troubles. In this way, thou shalt ere long find, the tempter is rebuked, the storm is over, thy sun break forth; yea, thou shalt yet sing, "O Lord I will praise thee; though thou wast angry with me, thine anger is turned away, and thou comfortest me." O how happy is a believer even in such trying circumstances, compared with those prosperous sinners, to whom it will shortly be said, "Remember that thou in thy life-time receivedst thy good things, and Lazarus evil things; but now he is comforted and thou art tormented."

NOTES.

CHAP. X. V. 1, 2. The vehemence of Job's passions, excited by his exquisite sufferings, here again brake through his better purposes: and he was urged to seek relief by complaining "in the bitterness of his soul," whatever the consequence might be. For, being weary of life, he seems to have wished to bring some sudden judgment on himself, which might at once end his days. Yet he would still beg of God not finally to deal with him as a wicked man; but to show him on what account he dealt with such extreme rigour with one of his upright worshippers.

V. 3. Job did not think that God would oppress his creatures, by punishing them without cause; as if he despised the work of his own hands, and took pleasure in destroying or disgracing it: yet he could not perceive how his dispensations towards him could consist with his goodness and mercy; and he supposed that his remarkable afflictions would tend to encourage the counsels and practices of wicked men, who often argue that there is no advantage in religion, and therefore seek happiness in the world by an ungodly life.

V. 4-7. Man's eyes see partially, superficially, and gradually; and his days are transient, so that he must make haste, or he may not find time to effect his purposes: but the case is entirely different with the everlasting, omniscient, and holy God. He could have detected Job's iniquity if he were guilty, without putting him to the torture to extort a confession: and had space to bring him to the trial and to convict him, before he proceeded to punish. Job could not therefore understand what God meant by thus afflicting him; as he could appeal to him that he had not been wicked, that is, an impenitent unconverted sinner; as the word translated wicked, generally, if not always, signifies. If, however, God, in sovereignty, was pleased to punish him, he knew it was in vain to contend with him; for none could deliver him out of his hands.

V. 8-13. In these verses Job expostulates with God, as if he had created him only for misery. The very hands which had fashioned him, (as the potter moulds the clay on all sides, till he has formed the vessel he intended,) now heavily afflicted him; and were about to destroy him, and reduce him to his original dust. He then gave an accurate account of his wonderful formation in the womb: when from his original liquid form he was gradually coagulated, as milk is curdled into cheese; and when the skin and the flesh covered him, till at length he was supported and braced by bones and sinews. To this material substance God had given life and a rational soul; and thus he had been born into the world, and had ever since been protected, and favoured with a variety of comforts: and could the Lord have created, preserved, and prospered him, only to render his downfall the more dreadful and his miseries more extreme? Yet all his sufferings must have been the result of a secret purpose thus to overwhelm him, and the event in like manner was known to God alone.

V. 14-17. Job did not deny, that as a sinner he deserved his sufferings: but he thought that justice was executed upon him with peculiar rigour, that every sin was noticed, and that God would not mercifully acquit him from his iniquity. If indeed he were a wicked man, a notorious sinner, and hypocritical in his religion, his case must be dreadful: nay, if righteous, or an upright worshipper of God, he was so crushed and dismayed that he should not dare to look up for mercy. Indeed he was full of confusion, and knew not what to think of his extraordinary case: yet he begged of God to notice his increasing affliction; and no longer to pursue him with his judgments and terrors, as the fierce lion hunts the trembling fugitive; nor to deal with him in so astonishing a manner. For every affliction was a witness of God's indignation against him, and nothing but changes of one misery for another awaited him, against whom God himself, and the whole creation, seemed to be at war. The gloom, unbelief, and hard thoughts of God that are here discernible, ought to be ascribed as much to Satan's temptations and Job's inward anguish of soul, as to his outward trials and remaining depravity.—The words rendered, "I am full of confusion," (15) may be rendered, "O be satisfied with my confusion," or disgrace.

V. 18-22. Job here more directly than before (Notes, iii.) expostulated with God for giving him his being, and for not cutting him off by death in the womb, or as soon as born. He considered death as at hand; and he begged a little respite from his anguish, that he might prepare for that closing scene; and for removing to the country, whence

Zophar sharply rebukes Job for justifying himself; and earnestly desires that God would answer him, 1—6. He shows that God is unsearchable, and man ignorant and presumptuous, 7—12. He reminds Job that repentance is the only way of recovering comfort and prosperity, 13—20.

he should not return. The description that follows, seems to be only intended for the grave, and not to relate to the invisible world. Coherency or exactness, in the discourse of one who spake in the bitterness of his spirit, was not to be expected; yet Job certainly believed that there would be a future state, and had some hope of happiness in it, though now much clouded and discouraged. But he here described the state of dead bodies in the grave as darkness and disorder: and he used many repetitions; meaning in general that they know nothing of the vicissitudes of day and night, or of the orders established among the living; and that men are cited thither, and arranged there, without respect to age, rank, or character.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—7.

As afflictions may speedily render us weary of life, how needful is it to have our treasure in heaven, and to be prepared for death! Yet we should not indulge a wish to quit our post before the appointed time. We are apt to think that we have a right to complain when we are greatly afflicted, and to fancy that it will be a relief to us. But, when we speak in the bitterness of our souls, we generally increase guilt and vexation, and our complaints rebound upon ourselves. In every affliction we should examine, “Wherefore God contendeth with us?” assured that he hath good and wise reasons for his conduct: and when we do not readily perceive his meaning, we ought most earnestly to entreat him to show us it; that we may repent of our sins, fall in with the designs of his corrections, reap the benefit of them, and escape final condemnation.—We may not be able, in some cases, to understand the reason of his appointments: but we must not for a moment suppose that he punishes without cause; or that his sovereignty resembles the arbitrary will of selfish and wicked men. Such thoughts originate from Satan brooding upon the enmity of our carnal hearts; and they commonly mingle with our discontent and impatience. Indeed the sovereign authority and irresistible power of God should be terrible to all the impenitent workers of iniquity, and to them alone: but if we are conscious that we truly repent, accept of proffered mercy, and desire to serve him, he will in due time end our trials and give us comfort.

V. 8—22.

The wisdom, power, and goodness of God, displayed in the wonderful formation of our bodies, and in giving us reasonable and immortal souls, and in all the mercies of our infancy, childhood, and riper years, demand our admiring grateful praise: but in a gloomy hour, when corruption prevails, Satan can induce even a believer to admit the dishonourable apprehension, that God created and preserved him only to make him miserable! Yet all man’s miseries are from his own voluntary wickedness; and whatever may be hid in the decrees and counsels of God, none shall finally perish, but the finally impenitent: and our Creator, (being in Christ become our Redeemer also,) will “not destroy the work of his own hands” in any humble believer; but will renew him unto holiness, that he may enjoy eternal life. But Satan plunges the tempted soul into one abyss after another: and if one blasphemous suggestion be rejected, another will be darted into the mind. When any one engaged in this conflict, is made sensible of the Lord’s righteousness in present sufferings, or even in the sentence of eternal misery denounced against sinners: he will be tempted to question the divine goodness, or to despair of mercy; to conclude that he is an exception to ordinary rules, precluded from the forgiveness reserved for others, and marked out to be treated with exact and rigorous justice. But the terror and confusion of those that are thus buffeted by Satan, is inexplicable, even by such as have had painful experience of it. Every thing then wears a gloomy aspect; and all seems to testify that God is become their enemy, and is pursuing them to destruction. In such a case one vain and foolish wish succeeds to another: men relapse into those sallies of passion which they have seen to be rebellious and vain; and want to be any thing or any where, but what and where they are. Yet if true grace possess the heart, it will glimmer forth a little in their darkest hours; some feeble actings of faith and hope will be discernible; and they will be restrained from the desperate language and behaviour of an ungodly man in similar circumstances. But if anguish of mind on earth may render the gloomy grave a desirable refuge; what will be the condition of those who shall be condemned to the blackness of darkness for ever! There unrestrained enmity, unmingled wrath, and absolute despair, reign eternally: light only serves to show their misery; and knowledge to augment their anguish. Let every sinner then seek deliverance from this dreadful state, and every believer be thankful to “Jesus, who delivereth us from the wrath to come.” Let all our troubles warn us of the shortness of life, remind us to pray to be spared till ready, and excite us to prepare for death, and to welcome its approach. Having obtained the earnest and hope of heaven, we need not look with horror upon the dark and silent grave; it is but the shadow of death, and cannot hurt us: and “if the Spirit of him, who raised up Jesus from the dead dwell in us, he will also quicken our mortal bodies,” and raise them up immortal and glorious.

VOL. II.—No. 13.

NOTES.

CHAP. XI. V. 1-4. Zophar, probably the youngest of Job's three friends, instead of being softened by his pathetic complaints, took up the argument against him with greater vehemence than Eliphaz and Bildad had done. He represented him as a man who loved to hear himself speak; and who, by affected eloquence, aimed to run down the most evident truth in his own vindication: and as one who maintained palpable falsehoods, and treated the most sacred subjects and most solid reasonings with contempt and mockery. It was therefore highly proper that he should be answered, rebuked, and put to shame. But what ground was there for these high charges? Job had said that "his doctrine was pure," which his friends could not disprove: and he was accused of saying, "I am clean in the eyes of God." He had indeed said that God knew he was not wicked, or one who concealed gross iniquities under the mask of hypocrisy: but he had also confessed himself a sinner, and craved forgiveness. And though he was tempted to question, whether God would be merciful to him, and had unadvisedly asserted that justice was rigorously exercised towards him: yet he had never supposed that God dealt unjustly with him.

V. 5, 6. Zophar despaired of convincing Job, and therefore wished that God would interpose to vindicate his truth and the justice of his providence: for if God should show him the secret, wise, and righteous reasons of his dispensations; or the extensive and spiritual nature of true holiness, and consequently the number and heinousness of his own sins, all of which were vastly more than he had any conception of; he would acknowledge that God exacted less punishment of him than he deserved. This, Job would not have denied: and when God afterwards did speak, it was in behalf of Job, and not against him.

10 ^m If he ^o cut off, and ⁿ shut up, or gather together, then who can ^{||} hinder him?

11 For ^p he knoweth vain men: ^p he seeth wickedness also; will he not then consider it?

12 ^q For ^{*} vain man ^r would be wise, though ^s man be born like ^t a wild ass's colt.

13 ^u If thou prepare thine heart, and ^v stretch out thine hands towards him;

14 If ^v iniquity be in thine hand, ^z put it far away, and ^a let not wickedness dwell in thy tabernacles.

15 For then shalt thou ^b lift up thy face without spot; yea, ^c thou shalt be steadfast, and shalt not fear:

16 Because ^d thou shalt forget thy misery, and remember it ^e as waters that pass away:

V. 7-12. These animated interrogations were intended to convince Job, that the nature of God is incomprehensible, and his judgments unsearchable: there being an infinity in his perfections and in his counsels, which no images can represent to our imaginations, and no reasonings or researches fully explain to our understandings. But this important truth, instead of militating against Job's doctrine, condemned the rashness of his friends, who inferred his guilt from his calamities, as if they had found out the secrets of the divine wisdom to perfection! whereas they had not the least conception of the real reason of his unprecedented sufferings! Zophar added, that if God was pleased to cut off a man's family, (or rather to alter the course of things,) to shut him in prison, or to gather armies against him, none could hinder him: that he knew the vanity and folly of men, and saw and considered the most secret wickedness of their lives or hearts; and had good reasons for punishing even those who appeared to men to be righteous: that man, ignorant and short-sighted as he is, has an ambition of being wise and knowing, is curious and presumptuous, and proud of his understanding, and the depth of his penetration. Though in fact he is born as uninformed as the wild ass; and like that animal, he fiercely scorns subjection and confinement, aims at independence and liberty in indulging his appetites; and is therefore very incompetent to the acquisition of divine wisdom and knowledge. Or, being obstinate, and headstrong like the wild ass's colt; nothing can make him wise to know his place and duty, but severe discipline and painful experience. The closing verse, however, is variously interpreted, and does not necessarily imply all that is suggested by our version of it; but may literally be rendered, 'That empty man may become considerate: though man be born as the colt of a wild ass.'

CHAP. XII.

Job reports on his friends, censures their pretensions to superior knowledge, and complains of their unkindness, 1—5. He shows that God often permits the wicked to prosper in this world, 6—11. He discourses on the perfections and works of God, 12—25.

V. 13—20. Here Zophar, after the example of Eliphaz and Bildad, exhorted Job to repentance, and gave him great encouragement, yet mixed with irritating insinuations. If, instead of vindicating himself, he would with due preparation of heart, humble himself before God, and stretch out his hands in fervent prayer to him; if he repented of his wickedness, and did works meet for repentance, he might obtain forgiveness, and stand with confidence before God, who would clear his character, recover his health, and establish him in prosperity: so that his misery would be forgotten, or only remembered as a cause of gratitude. Then his old age would shine with a brighter light of divine favour and felicity, than either his youth or more mature years: secure of the protection of God, and rejoicing in hope of future blessedness, he might order all his affairs with comfort and confidence, and close his life in reputation and usefulness. But disappointment, vexation, and ruin, inevitably awaited all wicked men: and their very hope would soon expire, as a dying man gives up the ghost. There was, however, no certain ground on which to conclude, that Job's deepest repentance and the Lord's most gracious forgiveness, must be followed by outward prosperity; nor any reason to conclude him a hypocrite, if he died in his present calamitous condition.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

Nothing is more unbecoming or more common, than acrimony and abuse in religious controversy. Opposition stirs up pride and resentment in the hearts even of godly men; the credit of the victory insensibly becomes the object, and an opponent must be represented as a dangerous and wicked man, that he may without censure be exposed to ridicule or hatred. But, in fact, a multitude of empty words neither require nor deserve an answer; and specious reasonings are best opposed by conclusive arguments: they that accuse others of falsehood and deceit, are commonly the first to transgress: and men often shame themselves by their invectives and misrepresentations, in attempting to put others to shame; or they manifest their own pride, when they would represent the sentiments of others as mockery of the truth. Such as are maintaining error are often most ready to appeal to God, and to express a high confidence that they are pleading his cause; and in the eagerness of dispute, the most important truths will be adduced in support of those very principles of which they are subversive. Yet we ought to endeavour to profit by truth, though we disapprove of the spirit with which it is maintained. We should often meditate on the incomprehensible perfections and works of God, that we may be made sensible of our own meanness, ignorance, and vileness. Some little of his wisdom, justice, and goodness in the government of the universe, we may discover by faith, from revelation; enough indeed to show us sinners that our sharpest temporal sufferings are less than our iniquities deserve, and so to render us patient and thankful under them: but the secrets of his wisdom, which we can never search out to perfection, infinitely exceed our narrow capacities. In this abyss our thoughts and reasonings are swallowed up: the height, and depth, and length, and breadth, of all his attributes pass knowledge; and our province is to believe, adore, and love. It is vain for us to dispute against his omnipotent sovereignty; nor can we escape his omnipresent and infinite knowledge. It behooves us to consider who and what we are, and to remember that we are born of a depraved nature, like the untractable wild ass. We should then give up our proud desire of comprehending the deep things of God; and of measuring his truths, judgments, and decrees, by the rule of our short-sighted reason. Our wisdom consists in preparing our hearts to seek his mercy and favour; to repent of our sins; to accept of his mercy and salvation; and to pray earnestly for his sanctifying grace, that we may cast away all our transgressions, and devote to him our bodies, and souls, and substance, and rule our families in his faith and fear. Thus being justified by faith, we shall have peace with God and confidence before him: and a quiet conscience, joy in the Holy Ghost, an affiance in a wise and kind providence ordering all for our good, with the lively hope of eternal felicity, will give comfort and steadfastness to our souls. Thus we shall forget our misery, as waters that pass away: the light of God's countenance will render our declining years more pleasant than those early days that were spent in youthful gayety: we may then rest in safety, and the work of our hands shall be established unto us. Trials may interrupt, but cannot destroy our happiness; nay, they will tend to increase it: we shall become truly honourable and useful; and may at length lie down in the grave without fear, and bid eternal farewell to pain and sorrow, at that period when the expectation and enjoyment of the ungodly shall eternally expire. For "the wicked is driven away in his wickedness; but the righteous hath hope in his death."

NOTES.

CHAP. XII. V. 2, 3. Zophar had treated Job's discourse as futile and erroneous; and his other friends were of the same judgment: Job therefore ironically retorted upon them. 'Doubtless,' says he, 'you three are the only men of understanding in the world, and when you die, no wisdom will remain on earth; but men will sustain an irreparable loss, being bereaved of such oracles of divine knowledge!' Yet he thought that he had some understanding of these matters, and did not fall below them: and indeed any body might know such things as they had advanced, as far as there was truth in them.

V. 4. Here again Job retorted upon Zophar, who had spoken of him as a mock: but indeed his friends treated his sufferings, character, and discourse with contempt, and reviled an upright man, who had long been an accepted worshipper of God, as if he were a hypocrite. 'You deride your friend, when you bid him call upon God, that he may answer him: but this is no new thing, for the best of men have been mocked on this fashion.' (Bp. Patrick.)

V. 5. Though a man have shone as a light in the world by wisdom, piety, or usefulness while in affluence: yet, as soon as he begins to sink into poverty or distress, he will generally be despised by the rich and prosperous; and they will mark every one of his mistakes or faults with severity, to justify their neglect of him. 'He that is near to his ruin, (as I now am,) is (to those that prosper and are at 'ease) like unto a lamp that is near burning out unto the

 'snuff; and therefore despised by them for the present,
 'however it have formerly shined.' (Bp. Hall.)

V. 6—10. Job here opposes facts to hypothesis. It cannot be denied, that audacious robbers and oppressors, and the most impious wretches, are often prospered in providence, and have riches abundantly in possession. The matter is so plain, that the whole creation testifies it. The animal tribes generally subserve the pride, luxury, and indulgence of ungodly men: the earth, and its richest produce is their property, and all nature drudges as it were to pamper their lusts. (Note, Rom. viii. 18—22.) Yet this is not to be ascribed to fortune or chance: but the Lord worketh these things as he pleases; seeing the life and breath of man, and of every creature, are entirely at his disposal.

V. 11, 12. The ear of man, attending to what is spoken, (that is, the understanding to which the report of the senses is made,) was formed to distinguish truth from falsehood, and right from wrong, as the palate distinguishes tastes. But Job thought that the distinguishing faculty of his friends must be obtuse, or vitiated by prejudice, otherwise they could never reject such obvious truths as he had stated to them. Indeed aged men, who have had long opportunity of making observations, are supposed to be wiser than others: but he intimated, that they had lived long to little purpose, as they were egregiously mistaken in so plain a matter.

V. 13—25. The transition from the former verse to the subsequent discourse seems this. The consideration, that length of days among men was supposed to increase wisdom and understanding, led Job to think of the everlasting God, whose wisdom and knowledge are infinite: and thus, without mentioning him, he proceeded to expatiate on his perfections and dispensations: showing that he believed the same general truths as his friends did, and could discourse upon them with cogency and fluency. He declared God to be the fountain of knowledge, wisdom, and power: and that his providence rules the world with irresistible authority. He destroys cities and imprisons the inhabitants: he afflicts the land with drought, or destroys them with a deluge, as he did the earth in the days of Noah. The crafty deceivers, and they that are deluded by them, fall in with his universal plan for his own glory; and even Satan, the great deceiver, accomplishes the purposes of God by his malignant endeavours to defeat them! Kings, legislators, conquerors, orators, are spoiled, disgraced, enslaved, overthrown, infatuated, beyond all expectation, as the Lord pleases; and they are sure to be at length rendered contemptible when they oppose his cause. He detects the most secret conspiracies, and the deepest intrigues of princes: he disposes of nations with absolute authority; and when any stand in his way, he throws them into such confusion, that they are perfectly bewildered, as if lost in a desert, or groping in the dark, or staggering for drunkenness: and thus they become incapable of the least effectual exertion. These important truths were suited to convince the over-confident disputants that they were out of their depth in attempting to assign the Lord's reason for afflicting Job: "when his ways are unsearchable, and his judgments past finding out."

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—10.

Reviling, raillery, and boasting, commonly prove infectious: and when we over-rate ourselves and court admiration, others will be disposed to under-value us, and treat us with contempt. Whatever some men fancy, there was good sense, sound reasoning, true knowledge, and heavenly wisdom in the world, before they were born; and the world will not be left in the dark, when these luminaries are set, and their labours also consigned to oblivion. Nay, when wise and good men die, blessed be God, wisdom does not die with them, but others are raised up in their places. We have all a right to judge for ourselves, being endued with understanding as well as others: and we should neither claim superiority over them, nor yield it to them in this respect; for we are cautioned by our Lord on both sides, when he says, "Call no man father upon earth; neither be ye called masters:" but in other matters our rule is, in honour to prefer others, and to sit down in the lowest place; and it is seldom wise or becoming to deviate from it. The most pious and conscientious men have commonly been treated with contempt by the worldly; and sometimes by their brethren, who ought to have sympathized in their sorrows, borne with their infirmities, and helped them with their prayers. However, though men despise them, let them but call upon God and he will answer them. Adversity and poverty in this evil world eclipse the light of wisdom and piety; and they who had once been honourable and useful, have sunk into contempt when they have fallen under misfortunes and become indigent. But worldly prosperity is of small value in the sight of God. He hath superior blessings for his children; and commonly he gives carnal things abundantly into the hands of those whose pride, luxury, and impiety are increased by them. The whole creation groans, as in unnatural bondage to the lusts of men. Every creature preaches the goodness of God and the ungrateful abuse of man, and testifies that this is a state of probation, not of retribution.

The faculties of our souls were originally formed as capable of discerning truth and falsehood, as our bodily senses are of discriminating their objects. Observation and experience should teach us wisdom. But through our depravity and the influence of our passions, we draw wrong conclusions, and make a perverse choice, and wander further from God and true wisdom with increasing years. Yet when renewed by the Holy Spirit, we begin to use our faculties aright; we receive wisdom from the fountain-head by faith and prayer; we learn useful lessons from all we see and experience; and acquire a spiritual taste, which savours truth and holiness, and is of use every hour of our lives. May we seek more and more to have "the eyes of our understanding thus enlightened," and "our senses exercised, by reason of use, to discern both good and evil." It is a main point of wisdom to set God always before us, to observe his working in every thing, and to feel our own absolute dependence on him. "He doeth what he will in the armies of heaven, and among the inhabitants of the earth, and none can stay his hand, or say unto him, What doest thou?" He creates or destroys, he exalts or depresses kings or nations as he pleases. All the power and policy of earth and hell cannot conceal any thing from him, or carry one point against him. All creatures

CHAP. XIII.

Job, as confident of his knowledge, appeals to God; disdainfully and peevishly reproves his friends for pleading against him with false reasonings and partiality; and warns them to fear the judgment of God, 1—13. In extreme suffering, and expecting death, he professes confidence that God would justify him, 14—19. He craves respite, and desires to know his sins, and why God dealt so rigorously with him, 20—23.

NOTES.

CHAP. XIII. V. 1, 2. With manifest self-preference, Job here declared, that the discoveries of God’s providential dealings with men which he had stated, were the result of his own exact and careful observation; and that he understood these matters better than his friends did, and therefore did not want their instructions.

V. 3—6. An improper boldness is discernible in the discourses of Job, for which Elihu afterwards reproved him: yet he did not mean to justify himself before God; but only to obtain a verdict in his favour from him against his friends, who treated him as a hypocrite; accusing him of crimes which he had never committed, and arguing from false principles respecting the divine government of the world. They visited him indeed as physicians, in his distress: but by their improper treatment they irritated his disease. They would therefore do him the greatest favour in their power, and most show their own wisdom, if they would hold their peace; and attend to his reasonings, from which they might learn to correct their own errors.

V. 7—12. The disputants meant to vindicate the Lord’s dealings with Job, and to plead his cause: but they bore false witness against their friend, and used deceitful reasonings in the argument. Now if such practices were admitted, in pleading for a king against one of his subjects; it would be called accepting his person, and be a reproach to his character and a disgrace to the cause. But God needed not such advocates, nor did his conduct need vindicating by such means. Job therefore reminded his friends, that when their conduct should be searched out, it would appear very wicked and dishonourable to God: and that he would certainly rebuke them for condemning the innocent. If indeed they duly considered the majesty and excellency of God, they would be afraid of his indignation, whilst under pretence of pleading his cause they acted so contrary to his example: and it would better become them to consider themselves, as sinful dying creatures, whose bodies would speedily return to the earth, and whose remembrance would be buried in obscurity or oblivion. Bishop Patrick thus paraphrases the concluding verse, perhaps according to the true meaning of the original: “Whose remonstrances on his behalf are no better than dust; and the arguments you accumulate, but like so many ‘heaps of dirt.’”

V. 13, 14. Perhaps Job’s friends seemed about to interrupt him; or showed apprehensions, that divine judgments would come upon him for so pertinaciously attesting his innocence. “Well,” says he, “keep silence, let me speak, and I will venture all consequences; for my anguish is so excessive that I could even gnaw my own flesh; and as I am not conscious of any great crime for which I am thus punished, I would even venture my life to have this matter cleared up.”

V. 15-19. The first clause in this passage may be properly rendered as an interrogation, "Though he slay me, shall not I trust?" but our version is formed from a change in the text on the authority of the Jewish writers, which in this case seems not at all necessary. Even if left to die of his diseases, or cut off by a sudden stroke, Job determined not to give up his confidence. His friends had intimated that the return of his prosperity would evince his former integrity, and his present repentance; but he, conscious that he had walked uprightly before God, and having an assured belief of his faithfulness and mercy, would confide in him as his salvation, even though he slew him, and would maintain before him, that he had not been a wicked dissembler; though he well knew that no hypocrite could escape detection or condemnation in his sight. He desired his friends to attend to his appeal, and to observe how he ordered his cause: he did not deny that he was a sinner; but he pleaded that he was not a hypocrite: from the charge of hypocrisy he knew that God would justify him; and he challenged them to bring forward the proofs of their allegations. He had lost all, except his character, the testimony of his conscience, and hope in God, which they endeavoured to rend from him; and it would be death to him, not to vindicate himself from their cruel aspersions.

V. 20-23. Job here addressed himself to God, and begged of him to try his cause. Provided his outward pains and his inward horrors were removed, so that the majesty of God did not overwhelm him, he was confident he could plead effectually in his own behalf; and he would either propose or answer questions relative to his case, as the Lord pleased. In the first instance he desired to know, how many his iniquities were? and especially he wished to discover what that transgression was which had brought his present calamities upon him? It is probable that Job intended this, merely as an appeal to God, that it was not hypocrisy or gross oppression: yet the address was querulous and passionate, and when the Lord actually spake, Job found he could not answer him. 'O God, I cannot accuse myself: or let me speak, and answer thou me.

23 ^a How many are mine iniquities and sins? ^r make me to know my transgression and my sin.

24 Wherefore ^s hidest thou thy face, and ^t holdest me for thine enemy?

25 ^u Wilt thou break a leaf driven to and fro? and wilt thou pursue the dry stubble?

26 For thou ^x writest bitter things against me, and ^y makest me to possess the iniquities of my youth.

27 Thou ^z puttest my feet also in the stocks, and [†] lookest narrowly unto all my paths: thou settest a print upon the [‡] heels of my feet.

28 And ^a he, as a rotten thing, consumeth, ^b as a garment that is moth-eaten.

'myself of wilful wickedness against thee: but if there be any secret iniquity that I am privy to, do thou make it known to me, and convince me of it.' (Bp. Hall.)

V. 24-28. As the Lord neither removed Job's pains, nor vindicated his character, nor comforted his soul, he considered him as hiding his face in anger, and holding him as an enemy. And he pleaded that this was beneath the infinite majesty of Heaven: seeing he was so mean and frail, and at the point of death, as a withered leaf or dry stubble, the sport of the winds and fuel for the flame. He thought that God framed more severe decrees against him, and inflicted on him more bitter things than upon any one else: and, as he was conscious that, during his maturer years, he had uprightly served the Lord, he supposed that his youthful iniquities, previous to his conversion, were now remembered against him, and that he possessed them in their painful effects. For it was evident that divine judgments confined him as a prisoner in the stocks, till his conduct had been examined, and evidence against him sought after: and that the prints of God's displeasure were marked upon his whole body, even to the soles of his feet, (ii. 7;) insomuch that it was consuming as a putrefying carcass, and wearing away as a moth-eaten garment. In these complaints we discern the effects of strong temptations and remaining depravity: yet in this chapter Job expresses a regard to God in every thing; gives many lively exercises of faith, hope, and confidence in him; and many evidences of a sound judgment and a tender conscience.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1-12.

It is very difficult for man to possess superior talents, without some appearance of ostentation and self-preference: yet "being clothed with humility" confers a peculiar gracefulness upon wisdom, knowledge, and every shining quality. In all our troubles of mind and conscience, we generally find men to be physicians of no value. They often either mistake our case, or attribute our distress to a wrong cause, or prescribe pernicious remedies, and by one means or other increase our malady. But when the conscience is wounded, and the heart dismayed with the fear of wrath, the prevalence of sin, the force of temptation, or the weight of affliction, we should apply to the Physician of our souls: whose knowledge, power, and love are infinite, who never rejects any sincere application, and who never leaves any case uncured. To him we may speak, and before him we may spread our case at all times; which is a peculiar comfort when we meet with harsh treatment from man: and though we are sinners, and have committed numberless offences; yet if our heart condemn us not of hypocrisy, we may have humble confidence before him. Sometimes the greatest comfort that we can afford the afflicted, consists in patiently attending to their complaints: and when we do not understand the subject in debate, or see that others know more of it than we, or are eager to be heard; it is our wisdom altogether to hold our peace, in hope to get some good when we cannot do any. Deceit and iniquity are doubly base, when employed in the professed cause of truth and piety: because they seem to imply, that religion needs to be supported by such disgraceful means. But the God of truth and love can never approve the conduct of those that slander, deceive, or persecute their brethren, under pretence of doing him service. Such conduct, when searched into, appears an impious mockery of God; and it springs from the basest motives, however secret they are kept. He will therefore surely reprove the offenders: and a due attention to the holy excellency of his character would fill with terror of his vengeance, all those who ignorantly hope for his favour in any unhallowed attempts to serve him.

him; and shows that all things on earth, and men especially, are subject to corruption, 16—22.

V. 13—28.

In this evil world, considering how frail we are, and how short our time is, we may find something to do, without abusing and reviling our brethren. Under every affliction we should aim to keep up a confidence in the divine mercy, which will preserve us, under the most exquisite agonies, from doing ourselves any harm. Though outward evils and inward distresses should unite in our case, and continue unabated till death; a strong and active faith, an acquaintance with the scriptural ground of a believer's hope, and conscious integrity, may enable the poor tempted soul to trust in the Lord, and to expect salvation from him. The upright may maintain his cause before him, and be assured that he will be justified: but no hypocrite can come with acceptance before him, or find admission into his kingdom. Yet it is best to repress our vehement passions, and to wait his time of clearing our aspersed characters; though to sit down under some slanders, without attempting our own vindication, be almost as the pangs of death to us: and it is cruel to bereave an afflicted man of his reputation, or to endeavour to discourage his hope in God, without any evidence of his guilt. It is indeed very desirable to have a clear conscience and an assurance of God's favour: yet great humility and reverence become us in appealing unto him. He knows us better than we do ourselves; and we should humbly beseech him to bring us acquainted with our sins, that we may repent and seek forgiveness. But he, who duly considers the number and heinousness of his transgressions, will not wonder that God hides his face and afflicts him; nor would he have cause to complain of injustice, if he treated him as an enemy. And though we are mean as the dry leaf or the stubble: yet, being also guilty and polluted, and fit fuel for the fire of the Lord's indignation, it would not be dishonourable to him, if he were to pursue us to destruction. Sins, long since forgotten by us, stand recorded in his book; no time can obliterate their guilt: and old age often possesses the iniquities of youth by bodily diseases, ruined circumstances, bad habits, a guilty conscience, or rebellious children: and it is a mercy, if final condemnation be escaped.—Should God mark our steps, and narrowly examine our paths, we could in no wise stand before him in judgment: he would indeed write bitter things against us; and both body and soul would eternally be filled with the print of his righteous vengeance. This will be the awful case of unbelievers: but there is salvation, provided and revealed; not from temporal sorrows, for our bodies must still return to the dust, and perish as a garment that is moth-eaten; but from the wrath to come. For when the believer, whose sins are washed away in the blood of Christ, shall drop the body, his soul will find admission into the realms of glory, and his body shall at length also arise incorruptible and immortal. Seeking first this eternal salvation, let us bear our present trials without a murmur; let us often humble ourselves anew for sins long since committed and repented of, and look forward to death as the period of all our sorrows. And let young persons beware of indulging themselves in sin, for even in this world they may so possess the iniquities of their youth, as to have months of sorrow for moments of pleasure. Their wisdom and duty therefore consists in remembering their Creator in their early days, that they may have assured hope and sweet peace of conscience, as the solace of their declining years.

NOTES.

CHAP. XIV. V. 1—6. Job, perhaps perceiving that his friends disregarded him, continued his discourse, by descanting upon the condition of man, and interspersing addresses unto God. He observed, that every man born of Adam's fallen race is short lived, and exposed to manifold afflictions: all his beauty, felicity, splendour, or gayety, falls before the stroke of sickness or death, as the gaudy flower before the scythe, or passes away like the fleeting shadow. He then expostulated with God, for noticing, or judging with such severity, a poor creature beneath his regard. He was indeed a sinner, being descended from sinful parents, as all other men were: and indeed in the whole course of nature the progeny partook of the propensities and qualities of the creature whence it sprang. Or, how could it be possible for his conduct to be sinless, when his heart was by nature polluted and unclean? In either sense, this forms a decisive testimony, that Job understood and believed the doctrine of original sin: and though he did not apply it in so humble and pious a manner as David afterwards did; (Ps. li. 5, 6;) yet he seems to have intended it as a plea, why the Lord should not deal with him according to his own works, but according to promised mercy and grace.—He proceeded to observe, that man's days were determined, and he could not exceed his appointed term of life; and therefore he prayed that he might have a little rest from his exquisite anguish, till the wearisome work of his life was over, and death should end his sorrows; which would be as welcome to him as night to the day-labourer.

V. 7—12. Though the tree is cut down, and the stump seems decayed in the earth; yet, if it be in a moist and fruitful situation, it may be expected that tender branches will shoot forth and grow up as a newly planted tree, or as if the old tree again revived. But when a man is cut off by death, he is for ever removed from his place in this world, and no one expects to see him again here: and his body returns to the earth whence it was taken, and mingles with it; even as the waters return to the sea, whence they first came. Thus he lieth down, till the consummation of all things, when he shall awake at the general resurrection. All these expressions imply Job's belief of that great doctrine; though both ancient and modern Sadducees have managed to misunderstand him. Why else should he speak of death as a sleep, and mention a period to it when he shall awake; even when the heavens be no more? (Marg. Ref.) Either Job meant by these considerations to comfort himself with the hope of having soon and for ever done with this wretched world: or he used them as a plea, why God should grant him respite from trouble to prepare for death, the consequences of which are irreversible.

V. 13—15. Job here earnestly prayed that God would speedily terminate his sorrows, and hide him in the grave, until his fatherly displeasure were past, or the present storm subsided: that he would appoint a time when he would release him: or at present dismiss him, till the appointed time of the resurrection and the general judgment, and then remember him in mercy. As, however, death would soon remove him hence; he determined to wait in patience and hope all the days of his appointed time, till that change took place: and to look forward in hope to the resurrection, when God would call him forth out of the grave, and he would gladly answer; when he would appear to try his cause and justify him, and no longer seem to despise or disgrace, but to delight in, the work of his hands.

V. 16—22. In the preceding verses Job spoke in some degree of faith and hope; but here despondency again prevailed. He represented God as strictly scrutinizing his whole conduct, and collecting evidence against him, which he preserved as a treasure sealed or sewed up in a bag, that he might be punished with the utmost rigour. He would not say that God did him injustice; but he thought he carried matters to extremity against him: and in that case he would certainly bring him to destruction without remedy. For his indignation must ruin the happiness and the hope of the most prosperous and powerful; as an earthquake subverts the strongest mountains, or removes the rocks: or if more gradually yet effectually, as the waters wear away the stones, or wash away the earth and its productions from the high to the low grounds. Indeed He irresistibly prevails against all who contend with him: by sickness or death he changes their countenances, and sends them away into misery: and when the body is full of pain or the soul of terror at the approach of death, the poor sufferer cannot notice either the prosperity or adversity of his family.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—15.

It is very useful seriously to reflect on the shortness and uncertainty of human life; on the vanity and vexation of all human enjoyments; and on the fading nature of all worldly splendour, which hath neither substance nor continuance: that we may cease to expect happiness from earthly objects, and learn to “lay up our treasure in heaven.” But it is still more interesting to advert properly to the cause and the remedy of these evils. “By one man sin entered into the world, and death by sin; and so death passed upon all men.” We receive our nature through this corrupted channel, and all the powers of our soul are contaminated by it: for who can produce a holy offspring from an unholy stock? Indeed the almighty power of God once formed the holy human nature of the Saviour in the womb of a sinful woman: but that was above and contrary to the established order of nature, that he might appear in the likeness of sinful flesh, and yet be without sin. All else are conceived and shapen in iniquity: and we all early manifest an aversion to God and his holy service, and our actual transgressions soon become numerous. So that unless we are born of the Spirit, no spiritually good thing dwells in us, or can proceed from us: and even the little good of the regenerate is greatly defiled. We should therefore learn to abase ourselves before God as abominable and polluted creatures: we should cease from all dependence on our own works, deprecate the strictness and severity of the divine judgment, and cast ourselves wholly upon the mercy of our God, according to the new covenant of grace through the mediation of our divine Surety: we should daily seek the renewing of the Holy Spirit, and look forward to heaven as the only place of perfect holiness and felicity. As the number of our days and months is appointed, which we cannot exceed; we should both seize the present moment, and pray for the preservation of our faculties and the composure of our minds, that we may prepare for eternity, and finish our measure of trials and services with comfort and acceptance; relying on the tender compassion of our Father, who remembereth that we are but dust. A span of life alone remains unto us; our duties are exceedingly important in their consequences to ourselves and to others: and if the opportunity be slipped, it will be irrecoverable for ever. Whatever then we find to do, let us do it heartily and immediately. If our trials be heavy and many, they will not here last long; death will finally terminate all our earthly sorrows and comforts: yet that is but a sleep; the soul will continue to live and act; and the body will awake and live when the heavens shall be no more. If our sins be forgiven and our hearts renewed unto holiness, heaven will be the rest of our souls, whilst our bodies will be secretly hid in the grave from the malice of our enemies, and we shall feel no more pain from the corrections of our God. At the appointed time, he will again remember us; and then we shall find every cloud dispersed, and every frown removed. Then the Lord will call his sleeping saints, and they will answer him; they will arise incorruptible and glorious; they will be publicly justified, and manifested to be his children and heirs; He will show his love to them, and his delight in them, as the creatures of his power and the subjects of his grace; and death shall be swallowed up in victory. A few more days of conflict and difficulty, and this change shall begin in death; and the soul released from sin and sorrow, and perfected in holiness, will joyfully wait for the re-union of the body, and that last and complete eternal change, when “mortality shall be swallowed up of life.” For this appointed period let us wait with godly fear, with realizing faith and cheerful hope, with diligent preparation and patient continuance in well-doing; neither desirous of living, nor impatient of the troubles of life.

We should on no account yield to the suggestions of Satan or the dictates of unbelief, to conclude, that the Lord can deal severely with a sinner, who hath a hope of everlasting life; or that he intends the misery and condemnation of those who trust in his mercy, and desire to know and do his will. We should number our own steps, and watch over our sins, and keep an exact account of our transgressions, that we may humbly seek forgiveness of them, and the more value the salvation of the Gospel: but if we thus judge ourselves, we shall not be condemned of the Lord. He may afflict us with salutary chastisements; disease may fill our flesh with pain, change our countenance, and wear us away: we may lose the comfort of our families and connexions, and every hope of earthly felicity: yet our God will not send the believer away into the regions of darkness and despair; nay, he will receive him into the realms of eternal felicity. But what a change awaits the prosperous unbeliever! When the appointed period arrives, a state of unmixt, unalterable, and eternal misery will succeed! How will he answer, when God shall call him to his tribunal? He indeed will then find, though now he will not believe, ^a that God numbered all his steps, and watched over his sins, and kept an exact account of all his iniquities, which are sealed up as evidence to be produced against him at the day of trial. And if the light afflictions which are but for a moment, that God's own children suffer here, be so wearying and distressing, what will the vengeance be that he reserves for his determined enemies! The strength of mountains and rocks cannot stand before his indignation, or shelter sinners from it. Their hope will then be destroyed for ever. Where will then be their possessions, pleasures, and distinctions? All past away and come to nought! Their countenances will then change, when the Judge shall bid them "depart accursed into everlasting fire, prepared for the devil and his angels:" and when body and soul are thus filled with anguish, will they be able to deduce comfort from the consideration, that their crimes aggrandized their families, and their estates descended to their posterity? But the Lord is yet upon a mercy-seat, ready to be gracious: "Oh that men were wise, that they understood these things, that they would consider their latter end!"

NOTES.

CHAP. XV. V. 1—13. Instead of being convinced by Job's reasonings or softened by his complaints, Eliphaz with increasing severity led on a second attack upon him. Job had been reputed a wise man: but Eliphaz asked, whether it consisted with that character, to propagate such empty notions, and to satisfy his conscience with them; when they were as unfit for the purpose, as the unwholesome east wind would be to satisfy his hunger? Would any wise man reason with such inconclusive arguments?—Thus contemptuously did he speak concerning Job's discourse. Yet in fact his doctrine was true, his cause was good, and many of his observations very wise and pious. Eliphaz next charged him with casting off the fear of God, and restraining prayer before him; either because he concluded from some hasty expressions, that Job had no reverence for God, and proudly refused to call upon him in his trouble; or he concluded, that his doctrine would embolden others to ungodliness with the hopes of impunity, or discourage them from prayer by representing religion as unprofitable. He further accused him with choosing craftily to cloke his iniquity with the semblance of piety; but that there needed nothing more than his own words to convict and condemn him. He next inquired, whether he was the first of men, and existed before the creation? Whether he was of the secret council of God, or had engrossed all wisdom to himself? If not, why did he pretend to know more than any of them; when they were, or had on their side, much elder men than he, or even than his father? And he demanded, "Whether the consolations of God were small with him?" That is, whether the consolations that they proposed to him, if penitent, were so small, that he should condemn them as physicians of no value? Or whether he had any better method of comfort and deliverance, which he kept secret from them! In short, he expostulated with him, for letting his own heart carry him into such arrogant behaviour to them, and into such daring impiety against God, as he had just uttered.— Temptation and anguish indeed had extorted several improper expressions from Job: but Eliphaz was evidently angry, because he did not confess himself a hypocrite; but Job argued against the decision of him and his friends, and treated their discourses with peevish neglect, as either false or inapplicable to the case.

V. 14—16. The holy God puts no trust in his saints, his holy ones, or holy angels; nay, he sees defect and mutability in the heavens themselves, as well as in its inhabitants, some of whom kept not their first estate: how abominable then and filthy in his sight is man, even every one who is born of woman! For it is evident that he naturally craves sinful indulgences with a greedy appetite, and seeks his satisfaction in them, as a thirsty man craves and drinks down water with greediness and delight: and that he quenches his perverse thirst in the same abominable manner as often as it returns. This text forms a conclusive proof, that these disputants were deeply convinced of the doctrine of original sin and the total depravity of human nature, as far as man is left to his own innate propensities. But that doctrine could not fairly be made to bear on the point at issue: because Job did not attempt to justify himself from the charge of sinfulness, but merely from that of hypocrisy or gross wickedness.

V. 17—35. Eliphaz here again laboured to confirm his position, that the righteous prosper and the wicked are miserable in this world. He stated, that this was not merely his own opinion, but a tradition received from their fathers, and which wise men had always approved and

Job reproves his friends for their conduct towards him ; and shows how he would have acted, if they had been so afflicted, 1—6. He pathetically describes his heavy and varied sorrows, 7—16. As a dying man, he appeals to God to attest his integrity, 17—22.

taught : and they especially, whose exclusive authority and prosperity were the reward of their singular piety. It was their uniform observation, that wicked men passed through life in pain, and in constant dread of death : that if they prospered for a little time, some spoiler or murderer soon came upon them ; and when they began to be distressed, they were driven to despair : and that in general they were speedily reduced to want and beggary ; and had their trouble and anguish embittered by the dread of impending vengeance, which would prevail against them as a victorious potentate. He did not mean that this was the case of every transgressor ; but of the presumptuous rebel, who opposed God's authority, arraigned his providence, and hardened his heart in defiance of his wrath ; whom prosperity had rendered insolent and secure : and who became outrageous in adversity, as if he would run upon the Almighty like a desperate warrior, who rushes upon certain death, that he may attempt revenge upon his enemy. He meant the man whose impiety was connected with rapine and oppression ; by whom whole cities had been desolated, and then occupied. Such ill-gotten wealth would never continue, nor the perfection of such prosperity be prolonged. The wrath of God, like a consuming fire, would destroy him root and branch, or, like a tempestuous wind, would drive him away into darkness and despair. Let not then any one, who had gloried in such false confidences, any longer deceive himself : for disappointment and vexation would be his recompense ; and his prosperity and offspring would come to an untimely end. For hypocrites, however numerous, would be exposed and ruined : and unjust judges, who had amassed riches by bribery, would be consumed. They had conceived mischief, and contrived deceit and fraud ; and they would find themselves deceived, and cheated with the shadow of happiness and the reality of misery.—Many important truths were contained in this discourse : but, as far as it related to temporal prosperity or adversity, it admitted of numerous exceptions : and it implied an invidious application to the case of Job. It was evidently intimated that he was the prosperous sinner, the presumptuous offender, the desperate rebel against God, the oppressor, the hypocrite, the corrupt judge : the ruin of his substance and family, his inward terror and anguish, were so many demonstrations of his guilt ; and his vindication of himself completed the evidence, and almost constituted him a blasphemer, as if he charged the Lord with injustice, and set himself in array against him. Thus Eliphaz inadvertently took the part of Satan ; and brought in a verdict against Job, as if he had actually and openly cursed God.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—16.

It is easier to answer than to convince an opponent : yet when arguments fail, contempt and railing generally most abound ; for more men are capable of slander and declamation, than of reasoning with cogency and temper, "The wisdom which is from above," teaches us to consider the tendency and effect of our knowledge, and renders us careful not to satisfy ourselves or amuse others, with unprofitable notions, empty words, or delusive reasonings : every investigation of divine truth should be conducted in the fear of God, and with fervent prayer : and whatever encourages men in sin or discourages their approach to the mercy-seat of God, must be false and pernicious. Yet prejudiced and angry disputers frequently charge consequences upon their opponents, which are not fairly deducible from their tenets ; and accuse them of those crimes which they abhor. Men's own mouths often proclaim their iniquity ; and even betray the secret hypocrisy of their hearts ; yet they, who are forward to make others offenders for a word, are commonly found most guilty, and in judging others condemn themselves ; and we should carefully distinguish betwixt the language of infirmity and temptation, and that of deliberate impiety. It is common for men to exclaim against the pride of others, when their own pride most prevails : this is self-evident, when they grow angry on being contradicted, and charge those who dissent from them with arrogance, with pretending to be wiser than all mankind, or engrossing all knowledge to themselves ; and when they would decide controversies by authority, and by their own superior age and experience. We should watch and pray against this indolent and self-sufficient spirit ; and that we may not misrepresent men's words, nor accuse them without evidence. In the worst estate of man on earth he hath many undeserved comforts from God. No consolations can be had in trouble, but in the way of faith and prayer ; no other secret can be found to heal a wounded conscience and a broken heart, than the encouragements of the Gospel ; and however proposed, they are worthy of our acceptance. Yet unmerited reproach and unseasonable severity may so embitter a man's spirit, that he cannot receive them from those that have thus discomposed him. But, alas, "what is "man, that he should be clean," or righteous ! Indeed pious men, who have differed in other things, have unanimously agreed that our fallen nature is abominable and polluted, delighting in iniquity, and drinking it down with greediness. We may then admire the patience of God in bearing with us ; and still more his love to us in the redemption which is in Jesus Christ, and the mercy and grace through him vouchsafed to all who believe.

V. 17—35.

We should not despise the wisdom and the result of the observation of the pious in former ages : but neither authority, reputation, antiquity, or greatness render men infallible. The word of God evinces, that men are, and will be, miserable, in proportion to their crimes, unless they repent and obtain forgiveness of them. Yet the most wicked may sometimes live long in outward prosperity, and die without any remarkable catastrophe: but the vexations of the world, and the thoughts of death and judgment, must fill them with pain and terror. Sometimes they are cut off by premature death, reduced to unexpected poverty, or beset with dangers on every side; or their departure is attended with horror and anguish. Commonly a curse corrodes their ill-gotten treasures, and their families speedily decay and sink into obscurity: and at all times the wrath of God, as a consuming fire, is ready to fasten upon the dying sinner, and as a tempestuous wind to hurry him into the regions of darkness and despair. This must be the case of all, who live and die forgetful of God and neglecting his salvation: but what will be the doom of those daring rebels, who strengthen themselves in direct opposition to the known will, to the cause, and the glory of God; and who prosecute their covetous, sensual, ambitious, or revengeful purposes, in contempt of his authority, and in defiance of his vengeance! who grow insolent in prosperity, and desperate in adversity, and whose blasphemous impiety connects with the most cruel oppression! Were it not notorious, it could scarcely have been conceived that men could be so infatuated in their enmity against God! But "can their hands be strong, or their hearts endure," when God shall call them to his judgment-seat? On the other hand, the righteous may be destitute, afflicted, and tormented, even until death: yet they shall be supported, comforted, and delivered: and the perfection of their felicity shall be prolonged for ever. Let none then deceive themselves and trust in vanity: as a man sows so shall he also reap: and the whole company of the wicked, however distinguished, notwithstanding all their power and sagacity, shall perish for ever. But let us apply these truths to our own heart and consciences, examine our own state and character by them; and cease uncandidly to judge and condemn our brethren.

NOTES.

CHAP. XVI. V. 1-3. Job here reproved Eliphaz for repeating what was in itself uninteresting and inapplicable: and he decided that all his friends had proved themselves miserable comforters; for they had reproached him without ceasing, instead of giving him any encouragement. He was surprised, that they would proceed with such empty discourse: and that Eliphaz should have the courage or rather harshness to reply, after that he and his associates had been so completely refuted. If we consider the speech of Eliphaz abstractedly, Job undervalued it: but as it related to the matter in debate, he must be allowed to have had some reason for what he said.

V. 4, 5. A very pathetic turn was here given to the discourse. Had Job been in health, at ease, and prosperous, and his friends sick, bereaved, destitute and tempted, he could have despised and reviled them very readily: but how would they have borne it? He would, however, have scorned to behave in such a manner: on the contrary he would have suggested topics of consolation to strengthen their faith and patience, and to assuage their grief, with the encouraging hope of a happy event to their afflictions.

V. 6-16. These verses contain most grievous complaints, and many harsh expressions, which may easily be accounted for, but cannot be justified. Job began by observing that he could obtain no relief, either by silence or by speaking, as all he said was misrepresented, and exposed him to further reproach. He declared that He, even

God, "had made him weary," even of his life: and then turning his discourse to him, he further complained, that he had destroyed his family, dispersed all his companions, and so left his friends to their mistakes, that they became his tormentors. He had likewise disfigured and wasted his body with dire diseases, so that his wrinkles and leanness were witnesses against him. He next spake of his enemy, "who hated him, tare him, and gnashed upon him" with insulting rage, and looked upon him as about to devour him. But whether he intended this of the severity with which Eliphaz had treated him; or whether he meant Satan, who assaulted him with every horrid and terrifying temptation to drive him to despair, or whether he thus spake of God as become his enemy, is not certain. (Marg. Ref.) But he doubtless meant his friends, when he spoke of those who "gaped upon him with their mouth, smote him on the cheek reproachfully, and gathered themselves together against him;" referring to their unanimous accusations, by which they wounded his spirit, and exposed his character to disgrace. He next complained that God had delivered him into the hands of wicked men: the Sabeans and Chaldeans had seized his substance; and his friends persecuted him, as if they had been ungodly men, nor could he obtain the least redress. Nay, the Lord himself brake him asunder, seizing upon him and shaking him, as a strong man when greatly enraged would seize and shake one that was feeble and helpless; he had set him up as a mark, at which all the executioners of his vengeance were required to shoot their arrows; so that he was wounded in his vitals, and broken with renewed afflictions; and the Almighty seemed to run upon him with irresistible force and fury, as a giant upon one who dared not to oppose him. He had therefore assumed the garb of a mourner and a penitent; and the sackcloth which he had put on stuck to him as if sewed to his skin; his honour and authority were turned into deep disgrace; he was disfigured with incessant weeping; and death seemed ready to close his eyes.

V. 17-22. It should be recollected that Job did not mean to deny he was a sinner, but he solemnly protested that he had not been an unjust oppressor or a hypocrite: and if he had shed any innocent blood, he called upon the earth no longer to cover it, but to disclose it for his full conviction. In that case he allowed, that he should have no right to compassion from man, or to expect that God would regard his cry for deliverance. But he was assured that He, who dwelleth in the heavens, knew his innocence, and would be a witness in his behalf. His friends indeed despised him; or spake eloquently against him, but he prayed with weeping before a merciful God: and he ardently wished, that he could have access to him; and have his cause pleaded before him, as one pleadeth for another before the tribunal of earthly princes; that he might have his injured character vindicated, before the appointed years of his life were ended, which had been but few, and were now, as he thought, very soon to be closed.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

We are all very incompetent judges of our own performances. We often suppose, that we have spoken things pertinent and excellent: when others deem them trite and inapplicable, and wonder that we should dwell on subjects not worth hearing, or be emboldened to speak at all. In fact, whilst the speaker is partial, the hearer is often prejudiced; and both parties should watch over themselves, if they would amicably settle controversies, profitably conduct conversation, or even preach and hear the word of God in a becoming manner. We are not suitably affected with the sufferings of others, because we "do not love our neighbour as ourselves." It is natural to those who are at ease, to give sage advice, grave reproofs, or solemn warnings to the afflicted: and even to censure and condemn them: but we ought to consider how we should feel, if we were thus treated in similar circumstances. Indeed the prosperous are commonly troublesome comforters of the afflicted: sympathy and tenderness of spirit are seldom learned, except in the school of tribulation: and the experienced believer, who can make allowances for the anguish of disease and the force of temptation, and recollects what topics have proved consolatory to himself, best knows how to speak a word in season to the weary, which may strengthen his faith and hope, and assuage his grief. In great distress, when we can get no relief, we are apt to yield to repining: and as the believer may then be tempted even to think hardly of God's dealings with him; he may well be borne with, if he speak peevishly and harshly of his fellow-creatures. The consideration of the variety of complicated miseries that a godly man may endure from the frown and correction of God, the rage and malice of Satan, and the ingratitude and cruelty of men; in conscience, reputation, connexions, body and soul, should teach us to prepare for trials, and excite our gratitude for our many mercies: and it should warn the sinner to flee from the wrath to come, which will be infinitely worse. How weary and desolate will the wicked there be! How will the rage of Satan, the company of the damned, mutual enmity and contempt, and the irreconcilable wrath of God, unite with the reproaches of conscience, and the horrors of despair, to fill them with inexpressible misery! There they will be the mark of all the arrows of divine vengeance, and employed in incessant weeping, wailing, and gnashing of teeth!—But should not the same reflection lead the believer to Gethsemane, and Golgotha? The divine Saviour had far more cause than Job to complain, that "he was made weary:" that all his company of followers were desolated ; that his enemy that hated him was permitted to assault and tear him ; that he was delivered into the hands of the ungodly, who gaped upon him, gathered themselves against him, reproached, insulted, smote and crucified him : yea, that “ it pleased the Lord to bruise him,” and inflict upon him agonies unknown : yet “ not for any injustice in his hands, also his “ prayer was pure.” He was wounded for our transgressions, and suffered for our sins, that he might deliver us from the wrath to come, and bestow upon us the gift of eternal life ! Should he not then be precious to our souls ? and ought we not promptly to obey and to suffer for his sake ?—If our conscience be sprinkled with his atoning blood, and testify to our integrity ; if our witness be in heaven, and our record on high, that we are not living in iniquity or hypocrisy : though our afflictions abound, our enemies triumph, and our friends despise us ; yet God will receive our prayer and regard our tears, and in due time plead our cause, clear our characters, and assign a period to our trials : and when we go the way whence we shall not return, it will be a release from prison, and an entrance into unalloyed glory and felicity.

NOTES.

CHAP. XVII. V. 1, 2. The nature and violence of Job’s disease, rendered it painful to him and offensive to others, when he drew his breath : and he concluded that his days were expiring, and that the sepulchres of his ancestors were ready for him. In these doleful circumstances he was surrounded with mockers who pretended friendship, yet insulted over his misery, and despised instead of comforting him ; nor could he turn his attention from their reproaches to view more encouraging objects ; or think of any thing else during whole nights.

V. 3—6. Again Job entreated the Lord, to give him some assurance that he would soon try his cause, or appoint some impartial person, to whom he could confidently refer the decision : for his friends being judicially infatuated, would never be honoured in such a service. He supposed that their former professions of affection for him understanding ; therefore shalt thou not exalt them.

5 He ^h that speaketh flattery to his friends, ⁱ even the eyes of his children shall fail.

5 He hath made me also ^k a by-word of the people, and [†] aforetime I was ^l as a tabret.

7 Mine ^m eye also is dim by reason of sorrow, and all my ⁿ members are ^o as a shadow.

8 Upright men shall be ^p astonished at this, and the innocent shall ^q stir up himself against the hypocrite.

10 But as for you all, ^u do ye return, and come now : ^v for I cannot find one wise man among you.

were mere flattery ; or that their doctrine flattered the prosperous, as if they must need be the favourites of Heaven : or he assured them, that though he desired fair treatment from them, he did not wish them to flatter him ; being sensible that God abhorred flattery, and that they, who aimed to advance themselves by it, would heap up disappointment and misery for their children. “ I must speak the truth of them, (though it displease them,) and not soothe them in their errors : for he that flatters his friends, when he should reprove them, may look long enough before either he or his children find one that will deal sincerely with them.” (Bp. Patrick.)—Indeed God had so reduced and afflicted his servant, that he was become a proverb and an object of derision even to those who before professed greatly to respect and delight in him.

V. 8, 9. Upright believers in different parts and ages of the world, would hear how this conscientious servant of God had been afflicted, and how his friends had treated him, and they would be greatly astonished. But this would excite them to distinguish themselves from hypocrites, and set themselves against them ; especially against such as condemned others merely because they were afflicted. And when God should make known Job’s real character, and the reason of his extraordinary trials ; his example would be an adjudged case, that no adversity could prove a man to be wicked, or an object of divine wrath : and this would be a great encouragement to the righteous, to hold on their way in the midst of difficulties, reproaches, and suspicions, nay, to grow stronger in faith under those very trials which detected and turned aside the hypocrite. Some explain the passage as a wish—“ Let the upright, &c :” but in fact these have been the effects of Job’s sufferings in innumerable instances ; and this was one grand design for which they were permitted. “ Ye have heard of the patience of Job ; and have seen the end of the Lord, that the Lord is pitiful and of tender mercy.” Here a glimpse of divine light, and a lively exercise of faith and hope broke forth in the midst of the despondency of Job’s discourse.

V. 10. Do you, &c. That is, 'Re-examine my cause, and alter your unjust decision: for I cannot find one among you who has spoken on the subject as a wise man would have done.'

V. 11, 12. The old translation seems here to be both most literal and intelligible. "My days are past, my enterprises are broken, and the thoughts of my heart have changed the night for the day, and the light that approached, for darkness." All the purposes Job had formed, however wise, pious, or benevolent, were, as he supposed, finally come to nothing, as his days were past. And now the thoughts which possessed his heart turned the night into day by preventing his rest. Yet when the light approached it was turned into darkness by the gloom of his disquieted mind. 'My thoughts will not let me sleep in the night, nor enjoy pleasure in the day.' (Bp. Patrick.)

V. 13—16. Whenever Job thought of waiting in expectation of his sufferings being terminated, that thought was associated with the idea of lodging in the dark and silent grave. His disease and his daily reflections, familiarized his mind to corruption and the worms: and he was induced to claim kindred with them through the present loathsomeness of his disease; and to expect more relief from them than from his friends and nearest relations.—He had indeed no hopes of temporal good; nor would they who flattered him with these expectations ever witness such a change in his circumstances. All his hopes would soon descend with him into the grave: when he and his friends also would rest together in the dust.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

If we are constrained to dwell with mockers and revilers, we should endeavour to take off our attention from them, by meditating on the blessed society in heaven; that our tempers may not be ruffled by abiding "in their provocation." Through our divine Surety, the believer shall not only be justified from his sins against God, but from all the false accusations of man. To be so judicially blinded, that the Lord hides the heart from understanding, forms a most dreadful case, and forebodes everlasting shame and misery; but this never befalls those who humbly trust and serve him; nor should we rashly conclude it to be the case of any, merely because they mistake in some things which appear to us of great importance. The Lord abhors the flattering of the prosperous, and the contemning of the afflicted: we should therefore study godly simplicity and candid compassion. Vain is the praise of men: they will extol one day, and insult the same person the next; they will idolize and then execrate, perhaps without any other cause, than a change in a man's outward circumstances. Let us then "seek the honour which cometh from God." As we, at this distance of time, may derive encouragement and instruction from the sufferings of Job, so may others from our lighter afflictions; and this may serve to reconcile us to them. Indeed the upright believer will extract benefit from every event. The falls of those who once seemed to run well, will teach him humble watchfulness and jealous fear; and stir him up to notice, and protest against hypocrites and hypocrisy: the afflictions of the godly will teach him the nature of his warfare, and warn him to prepare for the conflict: and the heaviest cross which is laid upon him, will eventually tend to strengthen his faith, increase his patience, and encourage his hope, whilst he is walking in the ways and doing the work of God. We should always be open to conviction, and ready to retract our erroneous sentiments and unmerited censures: for this is a good proof of a man's wisdom. The purposes and thoughts of our hearts are soon broken off, by sickness or the prospect of death: and they often break our sleep and darken our days with solicitude to no purpose. Let us then learn to renounce carnal hopes and anxieties, to execute immediately every wise and useful design, and "to cast all our care upon him that careth for us." Let us remember how nearly our bodies are allied to corruption, the worm, and the dust: and let us seek for that lively hope which shall be accomplished, when the hope of the wicked shall be put out in darkness; that when our bodies are confined in the grave, our souls may enjoy "the rest reserved for the people of God."

NOTES.

CHAP. XVIII. V. 2-4. Bildad had before given Job good advice and encouragement; (viii. 5-7:) but here he used nothing but rebukes, and presages of approaching ruin. He spake as if Job had some associates who took his part, when he said, "How long will it be ere you 'make an end of words?'" He thought it long before his time came to speak: and he called upon Job and all who were of his sentiments to mark with attention what he said. It must be allowed, that Job had spoken contemptuously "concerning the discourses of his friends, declaring that "God had hid their hearts from understanding," and that "he could not find one wise man among them:" for he had been too much moved by their unjust suspicions and erroneous principles. Bildad, however, seems to have been much more angry; as if Job had counted them senseless as beasts: because he had said, that he "took his flesh in his teeth," (xiii. 14;) alluding to his exquisite pain; Bildad ascribed it to his furious anger, which prompted him to do himself a mischief: and as he would not allow himself to be a wicked man; Bildad concluded that he wished to alter the fixed laws of the Lord's righteous government, in order that he might be exempted from punishment.

V. 5-21. The remainder of this chapter is a rhetorical declamation on the miseries of the wicked. There is indeed a great deal of truth and animation in the description: but the application of it to Job was unjust and cruel. It does not contain a single proof of the doctrine maintained in it, or of the wickedness of Job: for the former, Bildad appealed to facts which by no means would bear him out; and the latter he thought undeniable from his remarkable calamities. Yet if we include the state of retribution, as well as that of probation, we may deduce from it much useful instruction. Job had said, that "his light was 'short because of darkness,'" (xvii. 12;) yea, answered Bildad, it is always so with a notoriously wicked man. A glimmering of prosperity and a spark of hope may be given him; but both shall soon go out, and his family will share his misery. His most vigorous efforts to escape destruction will be unavailing, and his craftiest projects will entangle him. He is like a man who ventures on forbidden ground where nets, and snares, and traps are placed, which he cannot escape wherever he sets his feet: or like one in a dangerous road, where robbers meet and plunder him. In short, he lives amidst alarms and terrors, and is always ready to flee as from an enemy: famine, or penury, or other calamities, speedily befall him: afflictions, as it were, greedily devour him: diseases prey upon his strength and comeliness; and some one more dire than the rest, like the first-born son of death, fastens upon him, and cannot be removed. Thus all his confidences fail him: and death, as the king of all the terrors that have assailed him, stares him in the face, and affrights him with the near prospect of future misery. Nay, destruction takes up his abode in his tabernacles; divine judgments, like the fire and brimstone which destroyed Sodom, desolate his family, and leave neither root nor branch: his memory is either lost or disgraced: he is driven into darkness and chased out of the world, as not fit to live or willing to die; and he leaves no descendant behind him: so that all who witness his doom are terrified; and all that hear of it will be astonished. Surely, concluded Bildad, this is the doom of those who are uncommonly wicked.—No doubt he meant this application for Job; as the whole description is full of evident references to his varied calamities, and his desponding complaints. (Marg. Ref.)—But how different was the event of Job's calamities, and the sentiments of posterity respecting him, from what Bildad supposed they would be!

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The eagerness and asperity even of good men, when heated in controversy, are often very indecent. They are slow to hear, swift to speak, and swift to wrath; and ready to give, but unable to bear affronts: nay, sometimes they are led even to boast, and revile, yea, to misunderstand and misinterpret each other; to overlook all the wise and pious sentiments of their opponents; and to make the worst of every apparent error or sally of passion! We all perceive the folly of such violence in others, and many are ashamed of it in themselves afterwards: but few are able to avoid it at the time. It is therefore generally our wisdom, especially if our spirits are eager to shun controversy: and it is always our duty to watch and pray against pride; for if we duly considered how mean, guilty, polluted, and ignorant we really are, we should not be so much offended, were we counted stupid as beasts, and reputed vile in the sight of all others. Violent anger torments those who indulge it: and however we may fret and repine, we might far more easily remove the rocks, than disannul the immovable purposes of God, or alter the measures of his wise and righteous government: so that our wisdom and duty consist in seeking grace from him to enable us to submit, and to deduce profit from all his appointments. It is common for angry disputants to rank their opponents among the enemies of God; to draw perverse conclusions from important truths: and to confound their own opinions, which are often erroneous, with the unerring testimonies of Scripture. In this world there is no exact external discrimination betwixt the righteous and the wicked. Yet, even on earth, which is as the wicked man's heaven, he meets with continual anxiety, terror, and vexation; with pain and sickness; with bitter disappointments to his pride, avarice, or ambition; and with galling affronts and injuries: he experiences stings of conscience, and the dread of the wrath of God: and death is to him emphatically the king of terrors, which threatens to tear him from all he loves, and plunge him into all he fears. These things often extort the doleful groan: or else he smothers it in his breast, conceals it with a smile, or drowns it in hypocritical mirth. He is continually losing his comforts or his relish for them; and he has no calm confidence in God, no joy in the Holy Ghost, no lively hope, no communion with a heavenly Father, to countervail the loss. Yet he cleaves to the world, as his best; his all; and is chased out of it sorely against his will: whilst God seems to frown, and conscience forebodes that he is about to be driven from light into eternal darkness and despair. But whether he believe it or not, “surely such will be the dwellings of the wicked: and this the place of him that knoweth not God.” Thus “his light shall be put out, and the spark of his fire shall not shine.” Nor will it signify to him, whether his memory be honoured and his family flourish; or whether the one be buried in oblivion or covered with infamy, whilst the other is clean rooted out. But they who partake of the salvation which is in Christ Jesus, are happy in the midst of their tribulations: they have hope and comfort; peace of conscience and a submissive will are their privilege; death is no longer to them the king of terrors; nor will they be chased out of the world, or driven from light to darkness. Rather, death will remove them to the land of perfect knowledge, purity, and felicity: they “shall be had in everlasting remembrance,” and they may depart hence with the hope that their posterity also shall be blessed. Bear up, then, ye suffering believers: ye shall for a little time have sorrow, but your Beloved “will see you again, and your hearts shall rejoice, and your joy no man taketh from you.”

NOTES.

CHAP. XIX. V. 2—4. Bildad had begun both his answers to Job with How long? But Job thought that he had more occasion to complain of the incessant accusations of his friends, than they of his persevering self-defence. Their harsh words vexed his soul, and even broke him in pieces, destroying all his courage and confidence. They had reproached him ten times: a definite for an indefinite number. They ought to be ashamed thus to treat their friend as a stranger or an enemy: if indeed he were mistaken, his error chiefly hurt himself: and if he were guilty, he must bear the punishment; nay, indeed he was severely smarting for his sins, and was rather an object of compassion than of severity.

V. 5—22. In these verses Job very pathetically expostulated with his friends about their unkindness. If they were determined to magnify themselves against him, by assuming the authority of judges, they ought, at least, to consider how great his miseries were, that they might be aware what cause he had to complain, and how little reason they had to add to them; and that God himself was contending with him, and had overthrown him, and so entangled him in inextricable difficulties that he could not escape. He was plundered of his substance, and as inju-riously robbed of his good name; and he could not prevail to obtain a hearing of his cause, or any answer to his prayer. His path was obstructed by impassable difficulties, and covered with impenetrable darkness, so that he knew not where he was, or what to do. He had been stripped of his honour and authority: his possessions, family, and every hope of temporal comfort were destroyed, like a tree that is plucked up by the roots: he had such an inward sense of God's indignation, that he was, in his own apprehensions, counted as one of his enemies. In short, the judgments of God, like hosts of invading enemies, seemed on their march to besiege his tabernacle: and his friends, relations, and acquaintance, notwithstanding their attachment and obligations to him in his prosperity, were now estranged from him, and scarcely seemed to remember his name. His remaining servants would neither obey his authority, nor regard his entreaties, nor afford him any assistance; but kept at a distance, as disgusted with his appearance, or as despising his abject condition. Nay, even his wife, forgetful of conjugal affection and duty, would not come near him in his extremity; though he entreated her sympathy and assistance, for the sake of their children, the pledges of their former love, and the occasion of their present common sorrow. Even the children of his neighbours watched his motions, in order to deride him: and his inward friends, to whom he had intrusted his secret thoughts, and whom he loved for their supposed piety, were become his enemies, and abhorred him. In the mean time his disease had reduced him to a mere skeleton: nay, his very skin was consumed, so that nothing was reserved to him entire, but his gums and his teeth. In this wretched case he pathetically implored the compassion of his friends:

God had touched him in every tender part: they needed not add their persecuting reproaches to his awful judgments, as if vested with the Lord's prerogative, and acting by his authority; and should be satisfied with his outward sufferings, without wounding his spirit, or bereaving him of his hope in God.

V. 23—27. The Spirit of God seems, at this time, to have powerfully operated upon the mind of Job. The gloom and tempest of his soul were dispersed, and he afterwards discoursed with more serenity and resignation. At sometimes he had appeared ready to despair: but here he “witnessed a good confession,” declared the soundness of his faith and the assurance of his hope, and seemed to emerge from his temptations, in the extremity of his afflictions; even as the expiring Jesus, when the depth of his inward sufferings was over, exclaimed, “It is finished,” and “Father into thy hands I commend my spirit.” Job began by solemnly wishing that what he was about to utter; (for of that he seems to speak, rather than of the protestations of his integrity;) might be recorded in the most public and indelible manner, in a book, or with an iron pen in lead, or upon a rock for ever; according to the several methods then in use of registering remarkable transactions: and in this God granted and exceeded his desires; for, being written in the sacred Scriptures, his words will continue to the end of time, and be made known and useful to multitudes in all ages and nations. “I know,” says he, “that my Redeemer liveth.” The word Redeemer signifies a kinsman or near relation, to whom the redemption of captives, or of alienated estates, belonged by custom, before the giving of the law. The promised Seed of the woman, who was to bear the nature, and be the Redeemer of man, was evidently intended. Job was assured that this Redeemer of sinners, who ransoms and restores to them their forfeited inheritance, was his Redeemer; he was conscious that he embraced the promise of his coming, and expected salvation through him. He had no doubt but he was even at that time a living Redeemer: according to the words of Jesus “before Abraham was, I AM.” He believed also that “he would stand at the latter day upon the earth:” that in the fullness of time, he would appear as “the Seed of the woman,” “to bruise the serpent’s head,” whilst his “own heel” would be crushed: that after his resurrection he would stand up as the first-fruits of them that sleep in the dust of the earth: and that at the last day, he would appear as the Judge of the world to raise the dead, to destroy this earth, and to complete the redemption of his people. As to Job himself, though after his skin, which was almost destroyed, his body would be consumed by putrefaction: yet he should see God in human flesh; (so some translate it:) nay, he should be raised again from the dead, and behold his God and Saviour. Him he should certainly behold for himself, as his Portion and Felicity; not only as the object of mental contemplation, but with his own eyes, in his own body raised from the dead, and not in another. All this he firmly believed and assuredly hoped for, though at present his reins or vitals, were consumed within him by disease, and he despaired of recovery in this world. Other interpretations have been given of this extraordinary testimony:

but none that will bear comparison with this most obvious explanation of the original. The old translation of two verses is very literal, and worthy of notice. “For I am sure that my Redeemer liveth, and he shall stand at last upon the earth: and though after my skin, worms shall destroy this body; yet shall I see God in my flesh.” The last clause may either refer to the Redeemer’s incarnation, or to his own future resurrection, or to both.

V. 28, 29. After this confident declaration of his faith and hope, Job again warned his friends no longer to persecute him: as they had sufficient evidence that the root of divine faith and grace was planted in his heart, whence all true godliness springs: or, that on a careful examination, it would be found that his doctrine sprang from the root of truth; though he had shown infirmity in maintaining it. So that it would be dangerous for them to treat him as a hypocrite or an infidel; for God in anger might visit them with some terrible calamity; and teach them to their cost, that there is a judgment appointed, when he will avenge his servants on their enemies.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—22.

Harsh language from professed friends greatly adds to the weight of outward afflictions, and destroys the inward support and comfort of the soul. They ought therefore to be ashamed, who treat with unkindness, or load with reproach, those who have a right to expect comfort and assistance from them. Yet if our friends magnify themselves against us, and as unjust and unauthorized judges condemn us as hypocrites; it is best neither to lay the matter to heart, nor to keep an account of their slanders or revilings: lest we should be tempted to harbour resentment, or to watch our opportunity of retaliation. Rather let us “look to Him who endured the contradiction of sinners against himself;” and who was treated with far more unmerited and ungrateful insult and cruelty, than even Job was, or we can be. Yet it is very distressing to one who loves God, and hath long sought happiness in the light of his countenance; to be at the same time under his severe rebukes, to experience the hiding of his face, and the sense of his displeasure, and to be tempted to conclude that he is counted as one of his enemies! To be bereaved at once of outward honour, prosperity, and comfort, and of inward consolations! To have every prospect clouded with the appearance of further miseries, and the soul disquieted with grievous temptations and horrors! Yet, if to all this, the character be loaded with infamy, and every friend and relative be estranged and set against the sufferer; if those diseases or afflictions, which should command sympathy and relief, only excite disgust and abhorrence, and encourage the insults of the vilest of mankind; if this and more, should come upon any man at once, it would only render him more conformable to the Saviour, and not in the least weaken the proof of his being a child of God, and an heir of eternal glory. Nor should we be too confident that this will not be our case. Should it please the Lord to prove us with complicated afflictions, we know not how soon, or how many of our friends and nearest relations might forget every tie of nature, affection, and gratitude; how much our case and character might be mistaken by our most intimate religious companions; how far we might become a reproach to the foolish, and to the meanest of our dependents and inferiors: or how fruitless it might be to call upon any of them to pity or to help us, when the hand of God had touched us, and every one should act as if, dissatisfied with our outward trials, they were intent only on increasing our inward disquietude. We should then be thankful for present exemptions, learn to sympathize with others in distress, and prepare for the worst that can befall us.

V. 23—29.

No true believer will in any possible case be left quite comfortless: “there is a Friend who loveth at all times, and a Brother who is born for adversity.” The long expected Redeemer once stood upon the earth in human nature, as our Surety, to ransom our souls by his precious blood: we are assured, that in heaven he ever liveth to make intercession for us; and at the last day, he will again appear like himself, to raise the dead and to judge the world. At that solemn period all his enemies shall weep and wail because of him; but his people, raised up incorruptible, immortal, and glorious, shall see him as their God and Saviour, for themselves, in their own persons, and for their complete felicity, being made like him, and admitted to be for ever with him. Let us then give diligence, that we may be assured He is our Redeemer; and that we shall be numbered with his saints in glory everlasting. In the prospect of this happy consummation, let us solace our minds under the pressure of sickness or poverty, under the unkindness of friends and relatives, and in the prospect of death and the grave: for “though after our skin worms destroy this body; yet in our flesh shall we see God.” These faithful sayings are most durably and legibly written in the word of God: may they be engraven by the Holy Spirit upon the tablets of our hearts; that our assured faith and hope may unite with love and gratitude, to produce devoted obedience and patient submission to the Lord. This root of the matter being found in us, no slander or persecution can hurt us: and though for a time we may be discomposed, we shall again recover our calm, and wait for him to plead our cause, and judge betwixt us and our accusers. But, on the other hand, let us be careful not to censure those who profess faith, hope, and love to our common Redeemer, and appear to have “this root of the matter in them;” though they differ in many things from us, and are not without infirmities. Satan hath peculiarly triumphed in exciting Christians thus to persecute each other: and when believers put their hands to this work, they may as certainly expect severe chastisements in this world, as unbelieving and impenitent persecutors will experience the severity of God’s vengeance upon them in the world to come. For our Redeemer liveth, not only to save the souls of his people, but to enter into judgment with all their enemies.

NOTES.

CHAP. XX. V. 1—3. Zophar seems to have interrupted Job’s discourse: and not taking any notice of the excellent things contained in it, he hastily answered to the concluding warning. He was full of thoughts upon the subject, which were, in his opinion, so pertinent, that he trusted he should be excused for thus interposing. He considered the check which Job had given to the censures of his friends as a reproach; and he thought that his answer was the result of sound reason, of “the spirit of his understanding:” yet he spoke with great severity and harshness. The abrupt beginning of this speech of Zophar shows that he was in a passion, which, though he pretends to bridle it, would not let him calmly consider the protestation which Job made of his innocence. But he goes on in the old common-place way of the certain downfall of the wicked, be they never so powerful and well supported; which he illustrates indeed in an excellent fashion, with great variety of figures, and remarks on histories as old as the world. All the flaw in his discourse was this, (which was common to him with the rest,) that he imagined God never varied from his method, and therefore Job, without doubt, was a very bad man, though it did not appear he was so any other way but by his infelicity. 8 He shall fly away as a dream, and shall not be found: yea, he shall be chased away, as a vision of the night.

9 The eye also which saw him shall see him no more; neither shall his place any more behold him.

11 His bones are full of the sin of his youth, which shall lie down with him in the dust.

12 Though wickedness be sweet in his mouth, though he hide it under his tongue;

13 Though he spare it, and forsake it not, but keep it still within his mouth:

14 Yet his meat in his bowels is turned, it is the gall of asps within him.

15 He hath swallowed down riches, and he shall vomit them up again: God shall cast them out of his belly.

16 He shall suck the poison of asps: the viper's tongue shall slay him.

17 He shall not see the rivers, the floods, the brooks of honey and butter.

18 That which he laboured for shall he restore, and shall not swallow it down: according to his substance shall the restitution be, and he shall not rejoice therein.

19 Because he hath oppressed and hath forsaken the poor; because he hath violently taken away an house which he builded not;

20 Surely he shall not feel quietness in his belly, he shall not save of that which he desired.

21 There shall none of his meat be left; therefore shall no man look for his goods.

22 In the fulness of his sufficiency he shall be in straits: every hand of the wicked shall come upon him.

23 When he is about to fill his belly, God shall cast the fury of his wrath upon him, and shall rain it upon him while he is eating.

24 He shall flee from the iron weapon, and the bow of steel shall strike him through.

25 It is drawn, and cometh out of the body; yea, the glittering sword cometh out of his gall: terrors are upon him.

27 The heaven shall reveal his iniquity; and the earth shall rise up against him.

28 The increase of his house shall depart, and his goods shall flow away in the day of his wrath.

29 This is the portion of a wicked man from God, and the heritage appointed unto him by God.

V. 4—9. Zophar here asserted the same general truths, and fell into the same mistakes, as his friends before had done. He confounded this state of trial with the future state of retribution: he supposed that the dispensations of providence were conducted by one invariable rule, according to the characters of men: and he misapplied his doctrine to Job, as if it evinced him to be a hypocrite.—He inquired as in astonishment, whether Job did not know, what all reflecting men from the beginning of the world had observed; that the triumphing of the wicked was short, and the joy of the hypocrite momentary? He might attain eminence in authority, wealth, and reputation; he might be so exalted, as to seem out of the reach of enemies and earthly vicissitudes; but he would soon be ruined, with contempt and abhorrence. Men would wonder what was become of him; he would vanish as a dream, and there would be a full end of him and of his prosperity.

V. 10—29. In these verses Zophar expatiated on the variety of miseries which await the wicked man, whether profane or hypocritical. His indigent and distressed children would court the favour of the poor, either for a morsel of bread, or to disarm their revenge for the injuries they had endured. External compulsion or inward remorse would constrain him to restore their property. The licentiousness of his youth would expose him to dreadful diseases in his old age, and bring him down to the grave. The wickedness which he delighted in, concealed, spared, and would not forsake, but reserved as a sweet morsel to eat secretly, would create him such inward horror, such dreadful diseases, and such dire miseries, that it would be like the venom of the asp, or as if he had been bitten by the viper. He would be disappointed of all his expected pleasure and ease: and along with his ill-gotten wealth, he would be deprived of all that he had laboured for, as a punishment of his injustice and oppression. He would have no comfort of his riches, whilst they remained; and he would be stripped of all, (as Job had been,) and have nothing for any one to covet. This would come upon him

CHAP. XXI.

Job entreats a patient hearing, because of his singular calamities, 1—6. He shows that wicked men sometimes so prosper, as to grow bold in presumption, 7—15. Yet, that they at length fall into destruction, 16—22. And that the dealings of God with them in life and death are greatly varied, as their judgment is deferred to the day of wrath, 23—34.

suddenly, in the height of his prosperity, by a combination of wicked men, as Job's had done. Nay, just when he would be ready to say, "Soul, take thine ease, eat, drink, and be merry;" God himself would pour the fury of his wrath upon him. There would none escape from the weapons of divine indignation: his inward terrors would equal his outward calamities; so that every kind of misery would be laid up in store against him: he would be consumed as dried fuel, which burns of its own accord: for the judgments of God, without the intervention of men, would desolate his family. If his wickedness were before masked with hypocrisy, it should thus be brought to light: persons of all descriptions would unite against him. All he had would be totally dissipated. For this was uniformly the portion of a wicked man from God, and his appointed heritage. The reference in all this is manifest, not only to Job's calamities, but also to his complaints. His outward loss and inward anguish, the triumphs of his enemies, and the unkindness of his friends and relatives, are manifestly hinted at. Says Zophar, 'This is the heritage of a wicked man: and therefore doubtless thou art one.'

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

They are frequently the most forward to dispute, that are most evidently in the wrong. We are pleased with our own thoughts, as with our own children, and fancy that others will equally admire them. Thus we are led to make indecent haste to speak, lest we should lose the credit and gratification of our penitent observations; and lest others should lose the benefit of them! In this eagerness we consider each check as a reproach; and every effusion of passion, is esteemed a demonstration! But others generally judge very differently: nay, we ourselves can seldom reflect afterwards on such warm debates, without shame and remorse. It is very difficult for men of warm passions entirely to repress this unbecoming propensity: but watchfulness and prayer will do great things in a course of time; and we may profit by observing our own and other's errors, and by the rebukes and corrections of our heavenly Father. We must not limit the dispensations of God by our rules; nor censure others out of fondness for our own notions. But though the wicked do often prosper even to the end of life: yet it is a decided matter amongst all wise men from the beginning hitherto, that "the triumphing of the wicked," and "the joy of the hypocrite," are transient and fleeting:

and that they shall shortly perish disgracefully and for ever. In general, iniquity ruins men's constitutions; and if they are not cut off before, it entails pain and disease on their old age, which carries them down to the grave: the pleasures and gains of sin, like drinking sweet poison, or like the lulling venom of the asp, terminate in remorse, in anguish, and in ruin. A curse from God often corrodes the oppressor's abundance; he hath no enjoyment of it, and suffers none of those connected with him to have any ease or pleasure; and very often it is torn from him in an awful and sudden manner. "There is no peace, saith my God, for the wicked." But what are all weapons of iron and steel; yea, what is all darkness and consuming fire, compared with the eternal vengeance of the Almighty, which is the heritage appointed unto the wicked in the world to come? Then the hypocrite shall be detected, and have his portion with the unbelievers; whilst heaven and earth shall rise up against him: for "indignation and wrath, tribulation and anguish, are reserved for every soul of man, who," impenitently, "doeth evil: but glory, honour, and peace to every one," who proveth himself a true believer, by working that which is good in the sight of the Lord.

NOTES.

CHAP. XXI. V. 1—6. In this chapter Job discoursed less upon his own calamities, and more directly answered his opponents. He introduced his subject by entreating their attention, and desiring that they would neither interrupt him as Zophar had done, nor disregard and misunderstand his words, as they all had hitherto: this he would take instead of those consolations which he had vainly expected from them: and if after a fair hearing, his discourse was found impertinent, and his reasonings inconclusive, he would consent that they should renew their mockery. Indeed his complaint and appeal were directed to God, and not to them: otherwise his spirit might well be troubled, when sarcasms and reproaches were all they afforded him under his unprecedented sufferings. Yet if they looked upon him, they might see misery sufficient to demand compassion: and as they knew no evil against him, their bold interpretations of this mysterious providence, should be turned into silent astonishment. For indeed every recollection of the dreadful change, which he had experienced, filled him with trembling and consternation.

V. 23-26. Job, from his appeal to facts, justly inferred that there was no exact discrimination observed in this matter. One haughty sinner comes peaceably to his end, having experienced a continual series of health, indulgence, and success, like to cattle that feed in rich pastures. Others, who perhaps were not so wicked, never have known any thing but pain, sickness, poverty, and trouble, and die in anguish and distress. Thus both go down to the dust alike, and become food for the worms. The words translated "his breasts are full of milk," are differently interpreted. The word rendered breasts is not elsewhere used in Scripture; and some think it means milk-pails. But others, supposing it to coincide with the subsequent clause, thus translate the passage: "His ribs, (or sides, or viscera,) *are full of fat:" and this seems the true sense of the words.

V. 27-30. Here Job brings the matter to an issue. He knew that his friends wrongfully condemned him, as one who had usurped or abused his authority, and been an unjust oppressive magistrate and a hypocrite; and that they considered his desolated habitation as the proof of his guilt. But any common traveller, to whom they might refer the case, could point out the flourishing habitations and splendid monuments of the ungodly, which they observed in their journeys; from these tokens they would conclude, that wicked men were not punished here, but were frequently exempted from the calamities which overtook others; being reserved to the day of wrath and destruction in another world.

V. 31-33. Oppressors are often so powerful, that none dare call them to account or reprove them: and at last they die in peace, and are buried with magnificence; and they sleep as quietly in the grave as others do. Indeed, death closes their prosperity; but who have been, are, or shall be, exempted from this common doom? So that it is evident, that there is no exact discrimination betwixt the righteous and the wicked, in the outward dispensations of Providence.

V. 34. Job concluded with inquiring, why they comforted him in vain, with the hopes of returning worldly prosperity in case he repented and sought unto the Lord? Nor there was no truth in their system: nay, there was falsehood interwoven with all their answers, which rendered them inconclusive, and inapplicable to the subject.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1-16.

It is not easy to obtain an attentive hearing from eager disputants. Interruption and disregard are commonly reciprocal; hence misapprehension, unfair conclusions, and unmerited contempt and reproach: and when men have been suffered to speak, and have spoken to the purpose, their opponents commonly mock on, and treat the whole as trivial and ridiculous: but this conduct is peculiarly improper when admitted in respect to the afflicted, who should at least have the consolation of being heard with patience and candour. We might well yield to inward disquietude, if we had none to complain to in our distresses but man; or, if the Lord were as severe against us as our brethren sometimes are. But the true believer may speak to God at all times, and he will compassionately regard those complaints, and bear with those infirmities, which men disregard or condemn. The afflictions of the faithful, compared with the prosperity of the wicked, have caused astonishment and discouragement to the servants of God in all ages. But we should adore the depths of those judgments which we cannot fathom: and the clear light of the Gospel, with the discoveries of the eternal world, explains the difficulty, and shows the wise designs of God in all these dispensations. Yet under severe trials and temptations, the most established believer finds it as hard to apply his principles for immediate encouragement, as the mariner in a furious storm does to manage the vessel by the rules of navigation. It is undeniable that wicked men often grow rich and great, establish flourishing families, escape alarms and corrections, succeed in their projects, train up their children in pleasure; and, after a life of splendour and indulgence, go down to the grave in old age, without any remarkable calamity: yea, they are interred with magnificence, and many vain attempts are made to abate the horror of death and the noisomeness of the grave. And it is equally certain, that this has emboldened impiety and infidelity: and led many to infer that there is no God, or that he takes no notice of human affairs, and that religion and morality are needless or useless. Prosperity adds strength to men's pride and fuel to their lusts; and thus they grow hardened in pre-

CHAP. XXII.

Eliphaz shows that man's goodness cannot profit God, 1—4. He accuses Job of various crimes, which had brought on him his calamities, 5—14. He contrasts the doom of sinners visited by divine judgments, with the security of the righteous, 15—20. He exhorts Job to repentance, and encourages him to hope for mercy, 21—30.

sumptuous wickedness! Alas, what numbers do we see in this land where the light of the Gospel clearly shines, whose actions say unto God, "Depart from us!" Their open and constant violation of his law and contempt of his Gospel; their profanation of his day and desertion of his ordinances; their families left without the least appearance of religion; their incessant course of riot and dissipation; their inordinate pursuit of wealth or power; their discourse devoid of all reverence to the name, truths, or precepts of God, and full of levity and folly, if not of ribaldry and profaneness: these things seem to "say unto God, Depart from us, we desire not the knowledge of thy ways." Such persons do not desire to think, hear, speak, or read about him: they treat religion as if it were beneath their rank, fortune, spirit, or genius: they do not deem the Almighty on any account entitled to their obedience or gratitude: and they suppose his service to be a mere drudgery, which can yield neither pleasure nor profit, and in neglecting which there can be no danger! Yet "these prosper in the world, and have riches in possession!" And though the Lord be sometimes "known by the judgments that he executes:" yet they or their families, are seldom visited by remarkable calamities. Indeed, they as well as others must shortly die. But many of them outwardly enjoy more pleasure and suffer less pain, whilst they live, and when they die, than their pious neighbours. And though the pomp of their funerals, and the panegyric of their flatterers, will afford them no real advantage; yet they fare as well as others: and whether their children prosper, or are afflicted, after their death it adds nothing to their joy or sorrow. It is evident, that their good things are bestowed upon them by God: yet he distributes sorrows in his anger; and however spared for a time, they are as stubble before the wind, and as chaff for the fire of his indignation. For, indeed, it avails little whether wicked men enjoy on earth all the delights of sense, without pain, sickness, or hardship; or whether they live and die without enjoyment and bitterness: as they are all reserved to the day of wrath and destruction, and the misery which is beyond the grave will swallow up all their former comfort: and as they have said to God, "Depart from us, we desire not the knowledge of thy ways;" they cannot reasonably expect any other, but that He, the Fountain of felicity and Judge of the world, will at last order them to depart from him into endless and hopeless misery. (Marg. Ref.)

THEN Eliphaz the Temanite answered and said,

2^a Can a man be profitable unto God, * as ^b he that is wise may be profitable unto himself!

3 Is it ^c any pleasure to the Almighty, that thou art righteous? or is it gain to him, that ^d thou makest thy ways perfect?

V. 17—34.

We are not competent to declare what God, the universal Judge, ought to do, or to comment on what he doeth: Nor should we deem ourselves the objects of his love, or of his wrath, because of outward dispensations; or condemn any as sinners above other men, because visited with remarkable calamities. In all conclusions and arguments of this kind, there remaineth error, presumption, and self-sufficiency. But we are all speedily drawing towards the grave: and the wicked may suffer many dreadful calamities on earth, must have many peculiar terrors and vexations; and want that peace of conscience, that confidence in God, and that hope of heaven, which the believer enjoys; as their prosperity increases their guilt, and strengthens their intempered passions; as they have all their good things here, and have nothing to look for hereafter but unmixed and eternal misery: as they may expect to be banished from the presence of God hereafter; as the righteous hath all his evil here, and unmingled and eternal good in another world: we must certainly conclude, that the most adverse lot of a true believer is infinitely preferable to the greatest prosperity of an unbeliever. Let us then put far from us the counsel of the wicked: let us seek the Lord, and desire the knowledge of his ways: let us count his service our liberty and pleasure; and the privilege of praying to him, our highest honour and richest charter. Let us look forward to the general judgment and the eternal world; and we shall see the prosperity of the wicked and the trials of the righteous perfectly consonant with the eternal wisdom, justice, truth, and goodness of God; and shall cheerfully conclude, even when under his correcting rod, that they, and they only, are blessed, who trust and serve him.

NOTES.

CHAP. XXII. V. 1—4. Eliphaz still supposed that Job maintained that God favoured the wicked; and therefore he addressed him the third time. He intended, in this introduction, to show that God in all his appointments acted out of pure love to justice, and was not influenced by interested or selfish affections. He has nothing to fear or hope from any of his creatures; none can profit or injure him: his essential glory and felicity receive no accession from their obedience, however perfect: he is not excited by the greatness of any one, to institute a legal process against him to bring him down; nor can any one make him his debtor. A wise man consults his own advantage by serving God; but he cannot profit him. The Lord indeed approves and delights in holiness, because it is right in itself, and conducive to personal and social happiness; but not because he is any gainer by it. His justice therefore must be invariable and impartial: his rewards are the result of his love of good; and his punishments spring entirely from hatred of evil. These are great truths, and were well understood by the disputants. But Eliphaz and his associates, confounding this state of trial with that of future retribution, misapplied them to the case of Job; as if the justice of God could not be vindicated, unless he were proved to be a wicked man.

V. 5—14. In these verses Eliphaz brought as particular a charge against Job, as if he had had evidences ready to prove every tittle; yet he had no reason for his rash accusation, except that Job was visited, as he supposed God always visited every wicked man, and none else! He demanded whether Job could deny the number and greatness of his crimes? Indeed all have committed innumerable sins, in which is an inconceivable degree of criminality: but Eliphaz did not mean such transgressions as were common to Job with other believers, or even with men in general; but flagrant iniquities and impieties, which he had cloaked with the mask of hypocrisy. He therefore directly charged him with depriving his poor brethren of their necessary clothing, by taking them in pledge for pretended debts; and of withholding bread and water, or needful relief, from those who were perishing by want; of decreeing, as a judge, in behalf of the rich and powerful, for their favour and bribes; and of sending away the widows and orphans robbed of their property, and bereaved of all power to recover their right. His unexpected calamities, with which he was surrounded and entangled, were the punishment of these oppressions; and it was no wonder that he complained of being involved in darkness, distracted with terrors, and overwhelmed with afflictions like impetuous torrents, when he was guilty of such crimes. Some think, he meant that Job was blinded by his selfish prejudices, or judicially involved in mental darkness: or he would readily have perceived the reason of his calamities. All parties were agreed that God displayed his presence and glory in heaven, and was infinitely exalted above all creatures: but Eliphaz thought that Job thence inferred, that God could not know, or did not notice, the actions of men, which were concealed by the intervening clouds; or that, satisfied with the enjoyment of his own felicity, he disregarded the affairs of his creatures. So that, if he were not a direct atheist, he impiously denied the divine perfections and providence: and therefore he feared no punishment for cloaking his injustice with the show of piety, and vindicating his character when visited by the just judgments of God.

V. 15—20. Eliphaz here evidently adverted to the general deluge. The earth was then filled with violence; men had “said unto God, depart from us;” and they inquired concerning Noah and his few associates, “What can the Almighty do for them?” But though their houses were for a time filled by a bountiful Providence with good things, what way did they at length tread? They were cut down by an awful judgment, and the foundation of their confidence was overflowed and destroyed with the flood. This was well known; and

notorious sinners; and thought that he had the best reason to use Job's words, "the counsel of the wicked be-far from me:" (xxi. 16.) And as it was always matter of exultation and triumph to the righteous, when wicked oppressors were thus ruined; Job had no reason to wonder, that they seemed to mock at his calamities and complaints, whom they considered to be such a one. "But," added he, "our substance," who are real godly men, "is not thus cut down;" whilst the vengeance of God, like fire, consumes every remnant of those who by their crimes are proper fuel for it. Perhaps he alluded to the destruction of Sodom: Eliphaz's arguments and precedents by no means proved, that wicked men were always thus visited in this world; and the Sabeans and Chaldeans did no greater injustice to Job, than he did in this rash condemnation of him; whilst, in ascribing his own exemption to his piety, rather than to God's mercy, his discourse savoured of pride and ingratitude.

V. 21-30. The former part of Eliphaz's answer must be condemned; but this conclusion merits great commendation: though it implied that Job had hitherto been a stranger to true religion, and that temporal prosperity would be the sure consequence of his sincere conversion.
It contained, however, excellent advice and suitable encouragements. He exhorted Job to get acquainted with the divine perfections, and to seek an experimental knowledge of the God of salvation, whom a sinner may approach by faith and prayer. Thus he might have peace with him and his own conscience; and all possible good would be the consequence. The revelations which God had made to others, or would make to him, of his truth and will, should be received with submission of understanding, and with humble faith, and laid up in his heart as the principles and rule of his future obedience. Thus returning to the Almighty as his God and Portion, he would remove every kind of injustice far from his tabernacles; and might expect to have a prosperity built upon a firm foundation:
he would grow rich in gold and silver; nay, the Lord would be his treasure and defence: he should have great delight and confidence in him: his prayers would be readily heard and answered; and he would be continually reminded to perform the vows which accompanied them. His purposes would be established: his path would be comfortable: and when other wicked men were cast down, he would recollect, with joyful exultation, how the Lord had lifted him up from his abject condition; and preserved him from similar calamities, after he had humbled himself before him: or when the righteous were afflicted or cast down, he would be honoured as their helper and comforter; nay, his pious example, and endeavours, and fervent prayers, would render him a blessing to his country, in preserving it from public calamities, and promoting the cause of religion and righteousness.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1-11.

True wisdom consists with seeking our own interest;
yea, in seeking it, provided it be our true and everlasting interest, and we seek it in that way which God hath revealed: and godliness is always profitable to the possessor, "having the promise both of the life that now is, and of
"that which is to come." But it is absurd to suppose, that we can be profitable to God, or merit any thing at his hands. Even the perfect obedience of angels in these respects is entirely unavailing: how much more then the defective services of polluted sinners? All our comforts therefore flow from the unmerited mercy of our God; and under all our afflictions we should acknowledge that we suffer less than we deserve. He indeed acts as a Sovereign who gives no account of his conduct to the presumptuous objector: but his sovereignty is perfectly wise, righteous, faithful, good, and merciful. He approves of the image of his own holiness, and delights in the fruits of his own Spirit: and he graciously accepts the thankful services of the humble believer, whilst he rejects the proud claim of the self-confident Pharisee. It is, however, grievous to reflect, that numbers, having spoken excellently on the divine per-fections; so far from being "imitators of him, as beloved

Job longs to plead his cause before God, being assured of a favourable event, 1—7. He laments that he cannot perceive the presence of God: but is confident that he knows his way, and will bring him forth as gold, 8—10. He attests his own integrity, 11, 12. But is troubled by the immutable counsel of God, 13—17.

“children,” behave towards others, in direct contrariety to this perfect pattern; nay, cloak their own injustice and severity by expatiating on the mercy and justice of God! Even good men frequently thus transgress, when being eager in disputation, they harshly censure or falsely accuse their brethren. Let us then beware of this common offence. Let us pity and defend such as are suffering under the cruel injury of slanderous tongues. But should it be our lot to be thus afflicted, let us remember how Job was treated, yea, how Jesus was reviled; that we may be patient under the trial, and not render railing for railing. And let us examine ourselves, whether there be not some colour for the reproach; that our minds may feel a deeper abhorrence of the crimes of which we are accused, and that we may more watchfully avoid all appearance of them.

V. 12—30.

The injustice, rapine, cruelty to the poor, and oppression of the widow, the orphan, and the destitute, which too often prevail even in the place of judgment, or in the palaces of the great, evidently prove that numbers are practical atheists or infidels: that they have no proper sense of the perfections and authority of God; no realizing apprehensions of his presence with them, and his knowledge of their secret sins or secret thoughts; or no conviction that for all these things he will bring them into judgment. Indeed the invisible God is generally forgotten by them; “He is not in all their thoughts.” But they would do well to mark the old way of the transgressors before the flood; and that of the inhabitants of Sodom and Gomorrah. Such and more dreadful will be their doom ere long; however at present they prosper in their crimes, and their houses are filled with good things. Therefore every wise man will agree in saying, “The counsel of the wicked be far from me.” In this world we ought not to be “glad at the calamities” even of the wicked. Instead of insulting over them when afflicted, we should pity them, and pray for their conversion; and we must by no means ascribe it to our own piety, but the divine mercy, if we are exempted from grievous calamities. Hereafter, when the day of patience and grace shall be ended, and the wicked shall be cast into hell; the redeemed will cry out with exultation, “So let all thine enemies perish, O Lord.”—But let us here acquaint ourselves with him, that we may be reconciled to him, and enjoy his peace, which passeth all understanding: thus everlasting good will come unto us. Blessed be his name, we have immense advantages, which these ancient believers had not: we have both his precepts and his promises, his law and his gospel in our hands: may we receive them as the words of his mouth, and treasure them up in our hearts: may we return unto him by living faith, and cleave to him in holy love; and show the reality of our conversion, by casting away all our transgressions, renouncing all our idols, obeying his commandments, and acquiescing in his will. Then, whether we be rich or poor, prosperous or afflicted, the Almighty will be our Shield and our Delight; our prayers will be heard and our thanksgivings will abound; our purposes will be established, and a light will shine upon our paths; we shall be preserved when the wicked perish, be lifted up from every depth of affliction; and having been humbled under his mighty hand, we shall be exalted to the throne of glory. In the mean time our examples, endeavours, prayers, and influence, will be useful in preserving or delivering some from sin and misery: and whatever be our judgment of the character of others, we may safely recommend to them the same course, as the certain way to present peace and future felicity.

NOTES.

CHAP. XXIII. V. 2. Job's complaints were bitter, and his friends thought them rebellious; (so the word properly signifies,) but he maintained, that the calamities with which he had been visited, and the anguish he felt, exceeded all that he could express. The verse may be read as an exclamation: “Oh that to-day my complaint should be accounted rebellion! When my stroke is heavier than my groaning.”

V. 3—7. As Job perceived that his friends were resolved to condemn him, he referred his cause to the judgment of God: and he was earnest to have it decided as by a special commission. Eliphaz had exhorted him to “acquaint himself with God;” and to this Job seems to have referred, when he vehemently expressed his desire of knowing where he might find him. He longed to know where, and how, he might carry his appeal into the presence and before the tribunal of God, that it might be determined, whether he were a righteous man or a hypocrite; which was the point on which he and his opponents were at issue. He was assured that his judgment would be according to truth: before him he could order his cause with confidence, and produce many and conclusive arguments in his own vindication. He should then know what God would answer, and he did not fear submitting to his award: he seems also to have hoped that he should then understand the reason of his uncommon afflictions. He was assured that God would not crush him by his power, or condemn him by prerogative; but would rather support him by his grace, and encourage him by his condescension in ordering his cause before him. So that an upright person, when calumniated and silenced by man, might be allowed to argue the matter before God: and having appealed to his mercy as a Saviour, and being declared a justified believer, he would have nothing more to fear from his just and holy Judge. Some think that he meant Eli-phaz, who, as constituted to be his judge, had already most unjustly brought him in guilty of many atrocious crimes, and pronounced sentence against him. Job's consciousness of his integrity, and his confidence that the Lord would graciously decide in his favour, were well grounded: but there was a great want of reverence, humility, and patience, in his vehement manner of stating his desires: and in fact, the Lord did at last silence Job, by showing him his presumption, in thus pleading against his Almighty Sovereign.

V. 8—12. Job was sensible that God was every where present, and he was troubled at his presence as the author of his calamities, (15:) but his mind was in such confusion, that he could get no fixed apprehensions of his merciful presence, so as to obtain comfort and support by spreading his case before him; and he could perceive no tokens of the Lord's approach to deliver him, to silence his accusers. His efforts were all fruitless, and his views gloomy. The powerful operations of God were discernable; but his gracious presence was hid in anger; and he seemed to stand at a distance, or to frown upon him. Yet he was assured that the heart-searching God knew and approved his general conduct and character; and that when his integrity had been suitably tried, he should be brought forth, purified as gold from the furnace. For he was conscious that he was an upright believer; that he had obeyed the commands of God, and followed the example of his justice and goodness; and that he had steadily kept that path, without declining, turning back, or growing weary. Nay, he had relished and delighted in his truth and commandments more than in his necessary food: and would sooner have gone without his stated meals, than have deviated from his service. In these and similar protestations, it is evident that Job continually referred to charges brought against him, and the advice given him, by his friends. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 13—17. At this time Job seems to have felt that his vehement wishes and protestations were altogether vain, because he was aware that the purposes of God were irreversible and his power irresistible: so that neither persuasion nor opposition could induce him to deviate from his settled plan. It was God's decree and fixed purpose thus to afflict him, though he knew not on what account: but there were many such deep mysteries in Providence. The presence of the Almighty therefore filled him with terror, and melted his heart with anguish; and he could not conceive why he had not been cut off by death before these days of darkness: or why God would not cover him in the grave from the view of such distresses; or, as some understand him, how it was, that his exquisite sufferings did not cut him off, and thus terminate his sorrow.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

They, and they alone, who have experienced the conflict between faith and unbelief, hope and despondency, the desire to submit and the opposing power of self-will, during severe trials and sharp temptations, can clearly understand or account for the fluctuations observable in Job's language, and the state of his mind whence they arose: and the consideration, that so eminent a servant of God was harassed and perplexed exactly as they have been, cannot fail to bring them some relief. But our bitter complaints are very apt to savour of rebellion: and we should watch over ourselves in such circumstances, lest we provoke the Lord to increase his corrections. When we meet with unkind treatment or unjust censures, we should seek help and comfort from him: yet we ought to come in humble reverence, and wait his time with patience. Blessed be God, we may know where to find him: he is in Christ, reconciling the world unto himself; and upon a mercy-seat waiting to be gracious. Thither the sinner may come for salvation: and there the believer may order his cause, and fill his mouth with arguments taken from the perfections, promises, covenant, and glory of God; whatever his special request may be. Nor need we ever be at a loss for a conclusive argument, why he should pardon, teach, relieve, protect, comfort, and help us, if we trust his mercy and seek his glory. He will answer our inquiries by his word, and our prayers in his providence, and by his Spirit; and cause us to understand and approve his decisions. He will not crush or overawe us with his absolute power; but assist and encourage our supplications: and the only way to be delivered from our offended Judge, is to appeal to his mercy as our loving Saviour; for there is no condemnation for them who are approved true believers in Jesus Christ. Yet even for them there may be many temptations, sorrows, and perplexities: they may lose the sense of the favour of their God, and seek it in every ordinance, and by every means, for a season in vain. Yet He knoweth and approveth their path: he noticeth all their trials and difficulties: he will give them some distant intimation of a happy event: and when their uprightness is manifested, their graces increased, and their dross consumed, they shall come forth as the purest and most precious gold. But the Christian of whom we speak, is conscious of having uprightly embraced the salvation of God, and set out in his ways, by repentance, faith, and true conversion: he hath held his steps and kept his path, without turning aside for the sake of worldly advantages, or for fear of the cross. Many false steps he hath made; but he hath not been left to walk in the way of allowed sin: he obeys unreservedly, from love, and with the constancy of patient expectation. The word of God hath been the food of his soul; he hath an appetite for it; he relishes and digests it, converts it into nourishment, and is strengthened by it for service and for conflict. In his habitual judgment, he would rather want animal recreation, and starve for hunger, than be deprived of the spiritual sustenance of his soul: and therefore he takes pleasure in searching the Scripture, and in attending on God's ordinances. Those who answer this description, may be alarmed and troubled at afflictive events: they may be disquieted at the view of the unchangeable decrees and irresistible sovereignty of God; and perplexed about the reasons of his appointments. They may even think that the Almighty delights to trouble them, and wish that they had died before their trials: but this is their weakness and temptation. For nothing can come upon them, but what is appointed by infinite wisdom and love; nothing, but in order to humble, soften, and sanctify them; nothing but what shall terminate in their benefit, and that of their brethren, and tend to the glory of God: and in their sober judgment they would be willing to endure darkness and distress for a time, for these important purposes. May we then learn to obey and trust the Lord, even under tribulation; be willing to die when he pleases; for we know not from what evils we may thus be exempted; and to live as long as he sees good, as we are not aware for what good purposes our lives may be prolonged.

NOTES.

CHAP. XXIV. V. 1. If God uniformly punishes the wicked in this life, according to the opinion of Epicurus and his friends; Job supposed, that wise and godly men, who are acquainted with him and his way, would be able to give some account of the times of vengeance; to conclude how long the prosperity of wicked men would last; and to predict how it would terminate, and what degree of misery proportioned to their crimes would be inflicted: as men acquainted with the mind of the prince and the laws of the land, can foresee and expect the sentence, which will shortly be pronounced and executed upon notorious malefactors. There are days appointed for their trial, and penalties annexed to their crimes, and we know what to expect, as to the murderer or traitor. Doubtless the Governor of the world also hath his appointed times of vengeance: but, Why are they not discovered to his people? Why are they not marked or evident? They certainly would be if exact justice were awarded in this world: and as they are not, it is evident that the time of trial and the days of executing vengeance, are not appointed in this life.

V. 2—12. In these verses Job proves from facts, that notorious tyrants, oppressors, and robbers, generally escape adequate punishment in this world. Unjust rulers often, under colour of law, disseize men of their estates; and take away their cattle and substance as if forfeited: they oppress the orphans and widows, and drive the poor into concealment or banishment. Many likewise disdain the yoke of obedience to God or man, as the wild ass refuses to labour; and rapine and plunder are their daily employments. Thus troops of Ishmaelitish free-booters lived in the wilderness by robbing the travellers: others reaped the corn, or gathered in the vintage, from the lands which they had violently seized on; whilst the poor creatures; whom they had ruined, were exposed without clothing or shelter, to the inclemencies of the weather, and driven to make the rocks their refuge, and to live like wild beasts.
Such cruel tyrants would pluck away the fatherless children from their weeping mothers, to be their slaves; and take either them, or any poor person, into bondage, as a pledge for some debt contracted to keep their families from perishing. They regarded not the hunger, thirst, or nakedness even of those who laboured to support their luxury: but would take away the sheaf which the poor had gleaned; and suffer them to perish for hunger and thirst, amidst the abundance with which they were surrounded, and about which their labours had been employed. Men, thus wounded and crushed by oppression, publicly expressed their anguish in groans and lamentations: yet God in-

VOL. II.—No. 13.

licted no remarkable punishment upon the criminals, proportioned to their guilt, or equal to the miseries of the oppressed. Thus in this life, he did not expose and punish their folly; as he certainly will do, when he shall render to every man according to his works. The words rendered “they take away the sheaf from the hungry,” may be rendered “They are hungry that carry the sheaf.”
Or, Their reapers starve.

V. 13—17. Job here prosecuted his argument by bringing instances of criminals, who escaped detection, and eluded justice; as those before mentioned out-braved it. Such persons rebelled against the light, as if enemies to the sun; shunning all intercourse with it, as not being able to endure the discoveries which it would make. They therefore lay still all day: or only went out to mark their prey, and to make observations and form plans. Thus the murderer rising with or before the day-break, lay in wait for the early traveller to murder him; or he spent the night in robbery.
The adulterer or fornicator, waited for the dusk of the evening, and secretly having put a mask on his face, repaired to the haunts of his shameful practices. The house-breaker likewise concealed himself till all were asleep, and then forced his way into the habitations of honest men to plunder them. All these offenders hated day-light: they dreaded the approach of morning before they had accomplished their crimes; and detection was as death to them:
and thus they often, through life, escaped the punishment due to their crimes.

V. 18—20. These atrocious offenders, and many others, rushed swiftly and silently, like the gliding stream, into every iniquity: they acquired a portion on earth by such accursed practices, without bestowing pains to cultivate the land: spending their time in deserts, and being seldom seen in the way towards the vineyards, which were frequented by those who laboured in them. Some understand the passage, as a description of pirates who, sailing over the waters in light and swift vessels, grew rich by plunder, and despised, as mean and vile, the drudgery of cultivating the earth, and the profit acquired by it. Yet, as dry weather and heat evaporate the waters arising from the melted snows, or they sink into the earth imperceptibly and unnoticed; so numbers of these criminals went down unobserved into the grave. They were not ignominiously suspended on gibbets, to be devoured by the fowls of the air, but were buried and became a delicious morsel for the worms. And as no remarkable misery or disgrace attended their lives or deaths, even their mothers and nearest relations were soon comforted for them, and they were forgotten, as if no more criminal than other men: so that their wickedness came to an end, as a tree that grows undisturbed, and is not cut down, but decays and is broken through length of time.

V. 21—25. According to the observation Job had made on human affairs, many escaped in this world, who had injured the childless and the widow. The first clause may be rendered, "He feedeth the barren, that she should not "bear:" and some interpret it of the methods which profligate men use of destroying infants in the womb, to prevent detection, or for other vile purposes. But it may signify, the oppression of the poor called devouring them, by which marriage is discouraged, and the increase of the human species prevented. Others, having become powerful by iniquity, were able to prevail even against the mighty; so that none could stand before them or be secure even as to their lives, when they arose to plunder or murder. Or they formed connexions with other powerful tyrants, for the purpose of oppression. Men often indeed purchased their favour and protection; and confiding in their promises, thought themselves safe: but they allowed them only a transient respite; and watched for every pretence, or opportunity, to injure them. Thus they had their season of exaltation: and then, (as all must die,) they were gone, and brought low, and removed in as advanced age, and with as much ease as other men. Job having stated these undeniable facts, challenged his friends or any other persons, to prove them false or inapplicable; or to refute his doctrine that calamities are no proof of wickedness.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—12.

The Lord knows the proper times for delivering his people, and executing vengeance on his enemies; and he orders every thing in perfect wisdom, justice, goodness, and truth. Yet to the wisest and best of men, the conduct of his providence appears involved in perplexity: but the approaching day of judgment will throw full light on all his ways and works. In the prospect of that solemn season, we should neither be stumbled nor distressed at witnessing the prosperity of the wicked; nor discouraged if we share the troubles of the righteous. The history of all ages and nations proclaims the desperate wickedness of the human heart. So far from loving their neighbour as themselves, men, if not powerfully restrained, are induced by selfishness and idolatrous love of worldly objects, not only to withhold from others the comforts of life, but to deprive them by fraud or violence even of what is necessary, and to reduce them to abject misery. When this dreadful principle has surmounted the fear of human justice, or climbed into the throne, iniquity is committed with a high hand, or prescribed by law! At other times it operates by rapine or fraud: and in all cases it dictates the violation of justice, truth, and mercy to man, as well as the duties which we owe to God. But who can express the crimes that have been committed, or the miseries which have been occasioned, by this inordinate self-love! Men, more savage than tigers, have ever been disposed to prey upon the helpless part of their own species; and to plunder, oppress, enslave, or murder them, as best suited their purposes, or as they were able to conceal or to defend what they had done! or by their brutal lusts to reduce individuals and families, perhaps to still deeper and more exquisite misery! And though the groans of the poor, the naked, and the perishing; of the fatherless, the widow, the defrauded labourer; of those who are enslaved, dragged, or driven from their native shores, and cruelly tormented by human avarice, ambition, malice, and sensuality, do not seem to interrupt the indulgence of their haughty licentious oppressors: yet their cries enter into the ears of the Lord of Hosts, who is their Patron; and who will at length show before the whole world, that it is most dangerous to injure those who are least able to defend themselves. But "because sentence against an evil work is not executed speedily; the heart of the sons of men is fully set in "them to do evil." God doth not immediately impute folly to them: and therefore they proceed and encourage one another; and the earth continues full of violence and misery in multiplied forms.

V. 13—25.

The workers of iniquity, however distinguished, universally “rebel against the light:” if they did no violence to their own conscience, and to the common reason of mankind, they would not need bestow so much pains to conceal or to palliate their crimes. But after all the efforts of infidels and profligates, their practices continue shameful and court darkness; they hate the light of day, (as well as the word of God,) even when not exposed to the sword of the magistrate: and their fear of detection is an earnest of future conviction and punishment. The murderer, the adulterer, and the robber, (characters associated in Scripture,) may enjoy their accursed portion, escape punishment from man, and live long, and go down quietly into the grave: and they may be ready to conclude, that no harm shall happen to them. But “after death is the judgment:” and then they shall find, that all the while they abused the patience of God, and hardened themselves in impenitency, they “were treasuring up wrath against the day of “wrath, and revelation of the righteous judgment of God, “who shall render to every man according to his works.” “Then will they return and discern betwixt the righteous “and the wicked: betwixt him that serveth God, and him “that serveth him not.” And where is he that can disprove these doctrines, or deny that they are of infinite importance? Let us then be thankful, if we have been kept from such atrocious crimes; let us be as assiduous in seeking the salvation of our souls and in doing good, as sinners are in doing evil: and let us remember the apostle’s admonition: “ye have need of patience, that having done “the will of God, ye may receive the promise.”

NOTES.

CHAP. XXV. V. 1—6. The appeal to undeniable facts, which Job had made, seems to have reduced his opponents to great difficulties. They were not convinced of their error: but they could not answer his arguments. Bildad therefore spoke but few words in reply, Zophar did not answer the third time, and Eliphaz declined leading on another attack. Bildad, however, thought that Job had spoken without a proper reverence of God, or a due sense of his own vileness. He reminded him, therefore, that the sovereign authority over all creatures belonged solely to the Lord; and that all ought to reverence his Majesty, and to fear his omnipotent displeasure. All the inhabitants of heaven in perfect unity and harmony obeyed him: his innumerable creatures, marshalled in exact order, were observant of his commands, and entirely under his control: and as the light of his sun pervaded all the earth; so all, that partook of his goodness, ought to submit to his authority. But if the heavenly bodies were obscure when compared with his infinite glory, and in his view of them; how could sinful man abide the severity of his judgment, or be approved holy in his sight? As his very birth, amidst the sorrows and pains of his mother, proved him born in sin and a fallen creature! And as he was so mean a worm and so vile at his best estate, he ought not to contend with God, or exalt himself above him.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

It is better for Christians to avoid controversy, or to decline it, when they do not speedily come to an agreement; and to converse on such subjects as all allow to be true and important. The pious, however distinguished, agree that the wicked may flourish for a time, but shall be rooted out at the last: they should therefore be careful not to quarrel with each other, not to envy the wicked, and not to faint in tribulation. If we were duly influenced by the reverential fear of God, we should submit to his sovereignty, do his will, seek his glory, and rejoice in his favour in peace and harmony, and without murmuring and disputing; even as the angels in heaven do. Indeed his innumerable armies, yea, all his creatures, except fallen angels and fallen men, are in their several ways subject to his command. All things living partake of his bounty: ought we not then to bear deserved correction patiently, and use his gifts to his glory? And ought we not to imitate his kindness to the unthankful and the evil?—It is very important, that we be humbled as mean, guilty, and polluted creatures before him; but sinners may expect to be justified by faith, to be made holy by divine grace, and to be exalted to glory in heaven; where the sun and moon shall no longer shine, but “the LORD himself will be our everlasting Light.”—Our vileness will commend his condescension and love; and the riches of his mercy, and the power of his grace, will be magnified in every redeemed sinner, to all eternity.

NOTES.

CHAP. XXVI. V. 1—4. Bildad had brought no argument tending to refute Job's doctrine: and therefore he ironically admired the assistance which he had given to his friends in their extremity, and the instruction that he had afforded him in his perplexity! They had expected much help from him to their drooping cause; he had hoped for some important counsel in his difficulties: and all had supposed that he would abundantly clear up the controversy, and fully show how the matter really stood. But indeed he had spoken so little, and so foreign to the business, that they were no stronger, nor he any wiser; and all parties were just where they had been. Surely Bildad could not mean to utter words to him, as if he needed such counsel! Surely he did not suppose his words to be the dictates of the Spirit of prophecy, or even the language of faith and grace; when it was evident, that he spake in his own spirit. Many expositors indeed give another turn to the passage; and suppose, that Job meant to deride Bildad's speech; as if he thought the almighty and infinitely wise God needed such an advocate and counsellor. It is, however, evident that Job spake with peevishness and self-preference; but it is most surprising, that such a sufferer should have spirits for banter and ridicule.

V. 5—13. To show Bildad that he did not want his instructions, Job began more particularly to discourse on the works of God. The word translated dead things, may be rendered giants or monsters. Enormous creatures are produced under the waters, among the numberless inhabitants of the deep, by the mighty power of God. Neither the bodies which all over the earth are laid in the grave, nor the state of the departed souls of men, are concealed from his all-seeing eye; and even the place of punishment allotted to the wicked is under his inspection: the heavens are stretched out by him over the vast expanse of this north-ern hemisphere; and the earth is so wonderfully suspended in the pure space, that it needs no support. Immense quantities of water are treasured up in the atmosphere; and are so confined in the clouds, as not to rush down impetuously, but descend gradually, as is necessary for watering the earth. The throne of God in the heavens is hid by interposing clouds, being too dazzling for us frail mortals to behold: he confineth the raging ocean within its appointed bounds; nor will it ever break forth to cover the earth, whilst day and night endure. The mountains, (which appear as the pillars of heaven,) or the heavens themselves, are astonished and tremble, when the Lord speaketh in his wrath. He powerfully raises such storms in the ocean, as divide it into ridges of mountains; and he knoweth how to abase the proudest and stoutest of his enemies. Some think that the dividing of the Red Sea, and the destruction of Egypt or Rahab, (so the word is,) are here alluded to: but as there is no other reference to those events, as this is ambiguous, and as Job probably lived before that time; it perhaps refers to the general operations of the power of God. Finally, by his creating Spirit, he hath adorned the heavens with glorious luminaries; and replenished the worlds above with holy angels: and every formidable monster on the earth and in the waters, as dreadful serpents, crocodiles, and whales, are his workmanship, and under his control. Yea, the devil, who is become subtle and poisonous as the crooked serpent, was originally the creature of God, and is yet absolutely under his power.

V. 14. Job here declared his subject to be inexhaustible. They might discourse long on such things: yet a very little part of the works of God had come to their knowledge. And should He speak of his own power, in a manner becoming the subject; it must be in a voice like thunder, which would confound and dismay instead of instructing sinful man.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The most important truths may be introduced unseasonably: and be so mis-stated and mis-applied, as to deceive instead of convincing, and to distress instead of encouraging. We ought therefore to consider not only what is true and good, but what may be suitable and useful: we should advert to the person whom we address, and his situation and frame of mind: we should have some special intention of speaking; such as, to awaken a careless, or comfort a wounded conscience; to establish important truth, or refute dangerous error: and we should select our subjects, and handle them with a view to this intention: otherwise we may be derided for speaking impertinently, when we have advanced doctrines, in other circumstances, worthy of being regarded. But disputants can hardly avoid aiming at victory more than improvement; this produces mutual contempt and reciprocal boastings and revilings: and what seems to one party pregnant with instruction, decisive, plentifully declaring the thing as it is, is often treated with ridicule by the other. It is well, however, when all parties agree to celebrate the praises and extol the works of the Lord: yet the effusions of passion or ostentation may be mistaken for the dictates of those holy affections that come from the Spirit of God. But wherever we turn our eyes we may perceive the power, and wisdom, and goodness of God. The earth, and its wonderful revolutions and productions; the ocean under the divine control, and all its monstrous and numerous inhabitants; the operations of nature, in the formation of the rains and dews; the dispensations of Providence, in the governing the haughty tyrants of the earth, and restraining the rage of Satan; the effects of God's indignation in earthquakes, hurricanes, and storms; and his authority over heaven, earth, and hell: these are indeed a part of his wonderful works, but infinitely more is hidden from our view; nor could we hear, understand, or support the thunder of his power, or the terrors of his law. But in redemption all the other wonderful works of God are eclipsed: hither we may draw near and hear of his glory without dismay; we may come and taste of his grace, and learn to love him and walk with delight in his ways: here we may contemplate the divine character to advantage; and may adore the depths which we cannot comprehend, with the joyful expectation, of at length "seeing him as he is," and being for ever like him in purity and felicity.

NOTES.

CHAP. XXVII. V. 1. Perhaps Job had paused to hear whether Zophar or his other friends would rejoice. But either they were unable to answer him, or they despaired of convincing him: so that at length they suffered him to speak without interruption, and he proceeded in a grave and instructive manner, and as one fully satisfied that he had truth on his side.

V. 2—6. Job solemnly protested, that, as sure as God liveth, he had spoken and would speak the truth. But he was not impressed with due reverence when he spake of God, as taking away his judgment, and vexing his soul. He meant that God having inflicted on him the heaviest calamities, left him exposed to the unjust charge of hypocrisy, and delayed to vindicate his character, which exceedingly vexed his soul. But his language was very exceptionable, and Elihu justly rebuked him for it. (Marg. Ref.) Job expected soon to be deprived of the spirit, or breath, which God had given him; and he most solemnly protested that, to the last, he would not speak falsehood, either in condemning, or excusing himself: he would by no means justify the censures of his accusers, by allowing himself to be a hypocrite; nor would he give up his integrity, or the confidence and comfort of it: his heart should not reproach him with bearing false witness against himself, or for any allowed wickedness; for this conscious integrity, and his hope in God as to another world, were all that he now had to support him.

V. 7—10. It had been supposed, that Job counted the wicked happy, because he contended that they were sometimes prosperous; but he declared he could not devise a worse wish for his greatest enemy who rose up to ruin his character, seize on his property, reduce him to slavery, or murder him, than that he might have his lot with wicked men. Indeed they who hypocritically professed to be religious, (as his friends imagined he had done;) might thus obtain many temporal advantages, and retain them during life; but what would this avail them when God required their souls? Would he, in that or other seasons of anguish and trouble, hear the cries of those who had been dissemblers all their lives? As they had no delight in the favour and service of the Almighty, they would not call upon him at all times. In public, to be seen of men, they would make long prayers, but not in secret: in distress perhaps they would cry for ease; but being relieved, they would cease their prayers. Their best was but a pang of devotion of no continuance: and therefore God would at last reject them, as workers of iniquity.

V. 11, 12. By the powerful teaching of God, Job proposed to explain this subject to his friends; nor would he conceal any thing which he looked upon as a part of the truth. He thought they must acknowledge, that the wicked sometimes prosper, even to the end of life, of which they had all seen many instances. Why then did they answer so vainly? Did they take a pleasure in misinterpreting, contradicting, and condemning his discourse?

V. 13—23. Job may be thought in these verses, to have come over to the opinion of his opponents: but in fact he conceded all he could, to obviate misconstruction and to establish his own conclusions. He allowed that wicked tyrants and oppressors were often visited with sore judgments on themselves or their families, so that these might be called "their portion from God;" yet not so constantly and uniformly, as to be a rule of judg- ment for deciding on men's characters: this he had undeniably disproved, and it was all he contended against. He allowed that their numerous and prosperous families were often strangely impoverished and destroyed, whilst none were left to bury or weep over them; or they were hurried to the grave, and forgotten because abhorred. That they often laboured to get estates, which eventually came into the possession of better men: that the establishment of their families, which they had diligently promoted, was destroyed; as a moth is shaken out of a garment or removed as a tent, which was fixed for a temporary shelter to those who guarded the vineyards or gardens: and if they escaped such calamities, they soon lay down in death; and of all their riches, had not so much as the vain distinction of being gathered to their fathers by an honourable funeral: or they were not gathered amongst the righteous; but opened their eyes in hell, far from all their treasures and employments. The expectation of this doom overwhelmed them with terrors as an inundation: unexpected calamities swept them away, as men are plundered or murdered in the night. In short, the wrath of God, like a furious tempest, hurled them out of their places on earth, and cast misery upon them and did not spare: whilst they found it impossible to escape his dreaded and deserved vengeance; and those whom they had oppressed, rejoiced at their death and detested their memory. The main difference betwixt this passage, and the discourses of Job's friends on the same subject, is this: they spoke of the misery of wicked men before and at their death, as uniformly proportioned to their crimes: Job intimated that it might be so; but if not, the consequence of their death would assuredly be dreadful.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

We may safely make our appeal to God, when we are conscious of integrity before him, and are fairly called to it: but we are so apt to mix corrupt passions with our best services, to mistake delays for denials, and corrections for vexations, and to speak irreverently or impatiently when afflicted; that without continual applications of the blood of sprinkling, we cannot possibly have any well-grounded confidence before God. As we should not without scriptural evidence conclude that we are in the way of salvation, or deceitfully profess to serve God: so we should not be induced to condemn ourselves as hypocrites, if we are conscious that we trust in his mercy, and aim to do his will; nor should we justify those who censoriously condemn their brethren. A good conscience on evangelical principles, and a watchful opposition to sin, prevent our own hearts from reproaching us, and inspire confidence in God in the midst of afflictions and calumnies, and in the hour of death: “and this we should hold fast as long as “we live.” No worse misery can be imprecated, than the doom of the most prosperous sinner; no more dreadful case imagined, than that of the successful specious hypocrite. He may indeed call on God, when frightened or distressed; but he will soon give over, in weariness or despondency, and seek some other relief. But the humble penitent will knock at mercy's door, till it be opened, and not be induced by any delay to depart without a blessing: and he who delights in God, will always call upon him, in adversity and prosperity, in life and death. If we would teach others, we must depend on the help of the Almighty, and not conceal his truth: and if we would convince the erroneous, we must guard against misconstructions, and carefully show in how many things we are agreed. In this at least all good men are of one judgment: that the wicked may be, and often are, grievously afflicted upon earth with outward calamities; that they must be subject to inward terrors and vexations: and that even if they prosper till death, and die in outward peace, they will then be driven from riches, pleasures, and honourable stations, into eternal poverty, misery, and contempt, by the wrath of God, like a furious storm hurling them into destruction. In vain will they seek to flee out of his hand, whilst he shall cast upon them, and not spare the punishments justly due to their crimes. But “What is a man profited, if he gain the whole world, and lose his own “soul? And what shall a man give in exchange for his “soul?”

. NOTES.

CHAP. XXVIII. V. 1—11. Job had maintained, that the dispensations of Providence were not regulated upon such principles as his friends contended for; but by a higher and incomprehensible wisdom; and to illustrate and confirm this, he here showed, that the sagacity of men was chiefly competent for natural things, and employed in them: it could not therefore be supposed they were acquainted with the deep counsels of God. The all-wise Creator hath treasured up the metals in the earth: but man's necessity or avarice, hath prompted him to search for them. There he finds the ore of gold or silver, iron or brass, mixed with other substances, and resembling stones: and he knows how to separate and refine them by fire. With their lamps the miners put an end to the darkness of the subterraneous caverns, and search out all the valuable treasures contained in them; even those stones of darkness, which are situated in such perilous and unwholesome places, as may be called the shadow of death. Here floods break forth upon the inhabitants of these dreary regions; being those waters which had sunk into the earth from the foot of man, and formed subterraneous springs and streams: and the miners are forced, with great labour and danger, to make new channels; that the waters may run away from them. As by the labour of man, corn and other things suited for his food grow upon the surface of the earth: so precious stones, sparkling like fire; or inflammable substances, as brimstone or coals, are dug out of it. Among the stones of the earth are sapphires, as well as the ore of gold. In pursuit of these treasures men travel under ground, by a road which is unknown to the swiftest and most quick-sighted animals; by their persevering labour and contrivance, they undermine and overturn rocks and mountains; and they cut rivers and form banks under ground; whilst they seek out, and bring forth every hidden valuable treasure there repositied. This book is beyond all reasonable doubt one of the most ancient in the world; yet the art of mining and refining metals, and the use of precious stones, are spoken of as things well known in the east, where Job and his friends dwelt. But many ages after, populous nations have been found, which were little acquainted with these things: the iron especially, (which is in fact the most useful of all metals,) seems to have been little known or employed among the Greeks, in the very early ages of that nation; and it was totally unknown in America when first discovered. So that the most ancient times appear to have been far more civilized, and acquainted with things useful than, subsequent ages: and barbarous ignorance seems to have prevailed gradually; as the knowledge possessed by the antediluvians, and doubtless communicated by Noah and his sons, was then forgotten among their posterity. The Bible by no means favours the general notion, that the first ages of the world were the most rude and savage.

V. 12-19. Job here maintained, that wisdom, (or the knowledge of God, and his works and ways, which led to a prudent and holy practice, and might enable men to unravel the mysteries of Providence,) was far more difficult to be found, than the subterraneous treasures before spoken of. Indeed men in general neither knew where it might be obtained, nor its inestimable value. It was not to be found among men on earth, except as it came down from above. It could not be discovered either by digging into the bowels of the earth, or diving into the bottom of the sea, or sailing to all parts of the world. By these means indeed gold, silver, and all kinds of precious stones, might be procured; but none of them, nor all of them together, could purchase wisdom. Several different words are used in the original for gold; which are supposed to denote, either the place it came from, the manner in which it had been purified, or the form in which it was offered for sale, whether wrought or unwrought.

V. 20-22. As no wealth could purchase wisdom, so no creature could discover it. It was hid from the eyes of all living. Men of the greatest talents, who soared above the rest of mankind, as the fowls of the air above other creatures, could not, by all their speculations and discoveries, acquire wisdom. Death and destruction, indeed, brought some report of it: and if men thought on such subjects, they might have understood something of the reasons for which the wicked were permitted to prosper; and they would at length clear up difficulties, and effectually show what was man's wisdom. But previous and more particular instruction was necessary to make men truly wise.

V. 23-28. All the preceding observations and inquiries, were evidently intended as introductory to these closing instructions; in which Job showed, that God alone was the source and giver of wisdom. He knew where it was laid up, and the way in which it might be found. He managed the whole creation in perfect wisdom; determining the force and direction of every wind, and the quantity of water to be formed into rains and dews; regulating the course of the clouds, and directing the thunder and lightning. At the creation, He had his whole plan before him, and declared unto man as much as was good for him to know: and he had prepared the whole of his intended operations as accurately as if they had been searched out by intense study. This implied, that as men could not either alter or comprehend these works of God, they were equally unable to discover the methods of his providence. God had from the beginning plainly declared to man, that his wisdom consisted not in the knowledge of the secrets of nature, or of the divine government, but in "fearing the LORD and departing from evil." (Notes, Gen. xxii. 10—12. Deut. xxix. 29. Marg. Ref.) Thus Job intimated to the disputants, that they might show their wisdom much more, by a conscientious performance of their own duty, than by presumptuously intruding into the secret reasons of the divine dispensations; or rashly condemning their afflicted friend as a hypocrite.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The riches of this world are sought with unwearied labour and extreme danger: the faculties of the soul and the vigour of the body are alike devoted to the pursuit; and from age to age men sacrifice their ease, ruin their health, and venture their lives for them! Indeed they are good in themselves, and for the uses to which they were appointed: and the bountiful kindness of the Creator appears in covering the surface, and storing the bowels of the earth with so many useful productions: nor should the ingenuity or industry which men employ about them be condemned, except as disproportionate. Neither silver nor gold, but the love of them, "is the root of all evil:" and the avarice, pride, and luxury of the human heart, not the creatures which God hath made for our use, ought to bear the whole blame of the mischiefs to which they give occasion. It is also observable, that whilst God gives us all these things, he gives them in the way of industry; the productions of nature cannot be prepared for use, without venturing and enduring hardship for them; and in like manner, whilst wisdom and grace are freely bestowed, we must labour and deny ourselves if we would appropriate them. But did we understand the infinite value of these gifts, and our perishing want of them, we should think every hardship and sacrifice comparatively small. All earthly treasures are insufficient and precarious: they can give neither peace of conscience, nor health, nor contentment: they cannot prolong life, or abate the fear of death, or purchase exemption from future punishment: they must be left soon, and for ever, and an account must be given of them to God. But true wisdom and grace confer peace, and joy, and lively hope; they deprive death of his sting, and ensure an eternal inheritance. Who then can estimate their value? All the treasures of the world, and the whole world itself, are worthless in the comparison: yet, alas, every gilded bauble is preferred to them! No labour is deemed too great to employ about carnal things; every exertion is too much about our spiritual and eternal interests! "Go then to the miner, thou sluggard, consider his ways, and be wise:" imitate his ingenuity, application, and intrepidity, in the affairs of thy soul: seek salvation, as he does the gold and silver ore, and thou shalt be enriched for ever. But where is this wisdom to be found? In the heart of the earth? In the depth of the sea? Or in the schools of the learned? It is "the LORD that giveth wisdom." The treasures of it are hid in Christ, revealed by the word of truth, and received by faith, through the operation of the Holy Spirit. There the Lord hath prepared and declared it: there we may search for it and discover it. But it does not consist in explaining all mysteries, settling all controversies, or solving all difficulties in the phenomena of nature or in the divine government. It is not intended to feed our pride and vanity, to amuse our curiosity, or to embolden our presumption: but to teach us where we are, and what we are, whither we are going, and what we want, and where our wants may be supplied. It instructs and encourages us sinners to "fear the LORD, and to depart from evil," in the exercise of continual repentance and faith, and it admonishes us to wait for that world to which death will soon convey us, for fuller light respecting all the ways and works of God. Our business here is to believe, adore, love, and obey; not to comprehend and dispute. We receive the benefit of the rain, and avail ourselves of the winds and tides, and seek shelter from the storm, whether we understand the theory of them or not. Thus let us flee from the wrath to come, take refuge in the hope of the Gospel, and receive the comforts of life thankfully, and bear its burdens cheerfully, without being desirous of knowing those secret things which "belong to the LORD our God." The government of the world is his, and he neither needs nor asks our advice: but "to man he saith, the fear of the LORD, that is wisdom, and to depart from evil is understanding."

NOTES.

CHAP. XXIX. V. 1-6. It is probable that when Job had finished his commendation of wisdom, he paused to hear whether his friends had any thing to add: but as they were silent, he proceeded to contrast his former prosperity and his honourable conduct as a magistrate, with his present abject misery, in order to excite their compassion and to excuse his complaints: and perhaps to engage their more fixed attention to the other parts of his discourse. Indeed he could not but wish that matters were so with him at the present as formerly. Then God preserved his health, his property, his family, his honour, and his peace, having "made a hedge about him." Providence smiled upon him, and he enjoyed spiritual consolations; so that he lived happily, and walked securely, in this dark and wretched world. Thus he had been favoured early in life: the secret wisdom of God had been communicated to him, and his secret blessing had rested upon him and prospered his habitation: his soul had been refreshed with the secret pleasures of communion with God, before whom he had walked as his Almighty Friend; whilst his children shared and doubled his enjoyments. His cattle fed in rich pastures, afforded such plenty of milk and butter, that he could, had he pleased, have washed his steps in it: and his olive-yards, planted upon the rocky grounds, yielded such abundance, that it was as rivers of oil. But he intimated that God had now withdrawn his protection, and the light of his consolations; excluded him from communion with him; and bereaved him of his wealth and children.

V. 7-11. Job next expatiated on the honour that had been rendered him. He had acquired great authority, and was become a chief ruler over his people; probably through his reputation for wisdom and justice, as well as on account of his affluence. So that when he went through the city to the gate, where his throne for administering justice was prepared, the young men stood so much in awe of him, and so feared his reprehension for their irregularities, that they kept out of the way; the aged rose in respect of his character; and the nobles and princes were silent, as if bereft of speech, that they might attend and be instructed by his arguments and decisions: and indeed all that saw and heard him, applauded his impartial justice, and bare testimony to his wisdom and discretion.

V. 12-17. 'Because Job's adversaries did so much charge him with wickedness, he is compelled to render an account of his life.' And as no one attempted to disprove his attestations, no doubt he spoke what was undeniably true. He could confidently protest, that it was his constant object to redress the grievances of the orphans and destitute, who demanded justice against their powerful oppressors: so that widows and others, who were about to be crushed, murdered, or starved, thanked him, and prayed for him as their patron with joyful hearts. He never appeared in public, but with an evident determination to do justice: the equity of his conduct was to him the robe, or the badge of his authority, and he deemed it more his honour, than any royal diadem. By counselling the ignorant how to manage their affairs, he became as eyes to the blind: by supporting the helpless with his power and authority, he was as feet to the lame: he was the general guardian and father to all poor people; and neither spared pains and expense, nor feared opposition, in searching out their causes and rescuing them from oppression: so that he deprived rich oppressors of their power to do mischief, as effectually, as a wild beast is disabled when its jaws are broken; and constrained them to make restitution, as when the prey is plucked out of their mouths.

V. 18—25. Thus respected, useful, and conscientious, and considering all as coming from the favour of God, Job had hoped to live long in prosperity, and to die in peace and honour in a good old age: for he seemed like a tree, that had struck deep root in a well-watered soil, and was refreshed every night by the kindly dew. Heaven and earth seemed to favour him continually. He had done nothing to impair or to prevent the increase of his reputation or influence. His counsel was silently attended to, and his decisions were waited for with great expectation, and were refreshing as the seasonable rain. His smile was counted a very great favour: and if he relaxed from his usual gravity, and grew more familiar with the people, they did not abate in their respect, or undervalue his kindness. Still they allowed him to counsel and command in all their affairs, as a king with uncontrolled authority rules over his troops: yet amidst all he never lost sight of the kind employment of comforting the mourners.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The Lord protects and prospers us as he pleases; and he confers on those who love him whatever can be beneficial to them. Yet riches and flourishing families, though a candle of the LORD, may be soon and finally extinguished; they do but little towards illuminating our way through this dark world, and nothing towards cheering the vale of death. But when the mind is enlightened by the holy Spirit; when a man walks in the light of God's comforting presence, and enjoys the secret pleasure of communion with him; every outward comfort is doubled, every trouble is diminished, and he may pass cheerfully, by this light, through life and death to heaven. The sensible comfort, however, of this happy state is often withdrawn from those who have enjoyed it, and they regret the months and days which they have formerly known, and long for their return. In general, this change arises from negligence and grieving the holy Spirit: but sometimes it may be an honorary trial of a man's faith and grace. Yet it is always right in such cases to examine ourselves, to inquire into the cause by fervent prayer, and to redouble diligence and watchfulness. Many, however, who profess that they have walked in this heavenly light; complain that now it is not with them as in months past; and rest satisfied with unavailing lamentations! Depending on past experience, and concluding their state safe, they put up at present with worldly comforts, and are as negligent as they are joyless. And others, who have really walked with God, finding their comforts decline, are tempted to think all past experience a delusion, and to conclude that the Almighty hath finally forsaken them. But for those comforts which are indeed from God, the believer can find no substitute in the whole creation: and though they may be withdrawn, they shall never be extinguished, but shall be restored, and endure till lost in the blaze of heavenly glory. —Years, rank, and authority, if connected with eminent justice, wisdom, and piety, confer peculiar dignity and influence; they over-awe the careless and lawless; they command the respect of inferiors and equals; and procure a deference even from superiors. When a man's judgment and integrity have thus obtained him an established reputation, his opinions are readily approved and his measures adopted. Then it is peculiarly happy for him and others, if he be preserved humble, zealous for the honour of God, and ambitious only of doing good: if he value the blessing of the needy and afflicted, and the testimony of men's consciences to his equity and humanity as his robe, his diadem, and his recompense: if he continue a stranger to fear, favour, and affection, to covetousness and self-indulgence; and become the patron of the poor, the widow, the orphan, and the oppressed; desiring that their hearts may rejoice, and that their prayers for their benefactor may be united with many thanksgivings unto God: if by the use of his wealth, authority, and wisdom, he be as "eyes to the blind, and feet to the lame;" a father to the poor, and a terror and restraint to wealthy oppressors, and spare no labour for the effecting these valuable purposes. Such persons are public blessings: their protection is courted, and their friendship valued by all good men; though their excellency be hated, and their power dreaded, by the tyrants whose jaws they break, and whom they spoil of their prey. They prevent much mischief, make many wretched mourners joyful, and are an ornament to religion. And they have the peculiar honour to resemble him, who hath "put on righteousness as a robe, and is clad with zeal "as a cloak;" who rescues poor sinners from the power of Satan, and breaks the jaws of that devourer; who, in a far nobler sense, "is eyes to the blind, and feet to the lame, and a Father to the poor;" whose words are all in wisdom, truth, and love, and his favour more refreshing than the latter rain; whose smile is so great a blessing to the desponding soul that waited for it, that he can hardly believe his own experience, when the Saviour manifests his love; and he will adore and revere him the more for his unspeakable condescension. How many that were ready to perish, are now blessing him! How many mourners hath he comforted? But who can show forth all his praises? May we trust his mercy, and copy his equity, truth, and love! Let us not however flatter ourselves with the expectation of continued honour and prosperity in this world. In the midst of all we should think of dying soon; and even before death, of being deprived of all our outward comforts; though there should be every appearance, that life and prosperity will be continued to us. Storms will succeed to calms, and calms to storms in this changeable world: but in heaven will be uninterrupted and unchangeable felicity. Let us then look to our Captain and King: he hath chosen out our way, and hath been chief in sorrows as well as in honours: and as he comforteth his mourning followers; so he hath led the whole army of his saints the way to victory and glory, through tribulation, sufferings, and death; and hath said, "If any man will come after me, let him deny himself, and take up his cross, and follow me:" and "Where I am, there shall my servant be."

NOTES.

CHAP. XXX. V. 1—14. Here Job most pathetically contrasts his present condition with his former honour and authority. Now the youths, that before had hid themselves lest they should be punished for their crimes, treated him with the greatest contempt: nay, the children of the most abject persons imaginable insulted him, whom he described as the vilest outcasts of society. They were so destitute of fidelity and honesty, so lazy and ignorant, that they were not capable of doing so much good as the dogs of his flock; and he would have disdained to have employed them in the meanest services about his cattle. Their lives, wasted in wickedness, had left them debilitated and ignorant, debauched and infamous in old age: and being burdens and nuisances by their crimes, they were expelled from society in a most miserable manner. Incapable of obtaining an honest livelihood, and afraid of being punished for their past offences, they had fled into the most desolate parts of the wilderness; and there lived, or rather starved, upon roots and herbs not fitted to sustain the life of man. For they were driven away as thieves, and concealed themselves in dens and caves from the search of pursuers; or among the weeds and bushes, where they grew savage like the wild asses. Such worthless wretches, of whom Job's active magistracy had rid the country, returned with their families when he was reduced: and, though their ignorant and profligate parents neglected to give them any good instructions; yet they had learned to make songs and jests about Job; and to show their contempt and abhorrence by affecting to shun him as a loathsome object, or drawing near him to spit in his face. It may be supposed, that these were the expressions of their resentment for his former opposition to their villany; and of their joy that his authority was terminated. Because the Lord had loosed his cord, by depriving him of power and affluence, they behaved with unbridled insolence, and attempted to injure and destroy him by every means they could devise. It is likely that they accused Job of oppression, because he had punished them for their crimes: and thus they endeavoured to "fortify the ways of their destruction," or to secure themselves from punishment in their abandoned courses. By these methods they married or vilified his path, and helped forward his calamity, exciting his friends to treat him as a hypocrite; and they had no need of help from Job's former friends, being already sufficiently daring and ingenious in their malice:

for they came upon him as a torrent of waters, which bursts the banks, and rolls on with rapid desolation.

V. 15—19. Job again complained of terrors, which doubtless arose in great measure from Satan's temptations. These agitated and pursued his soul like a tempest, and drove all his comfort away as a cloud vanisheth: so that all his courage and resolution were destroyed, and his very soul poured out as if melted by the fire. For affliction had so seized upon him that he was unable to escape. His bones and sinews also were in such incessant anguish, that they seemed to be pierced with a sword, and he could have no rest. His sores defiled his garments, and so confined him that he could not move without extreme pain. He was as disgusting to the sight, through the calamity which God had inflicted, as if he had been rolled in the mire: yea, he was become like dust and ashes, before he was laid in the grave.

V. 20—24. It added greatly to Job's distress, that he could obtain no answer to his prayers; and though he stood up to appeal to the Lord respecting his injured character, he was disregarded. He therefore rashly concluded that the Lord was become rigorous to him, even to a degree of cruelty, and used his power expressly to oppose and distress him: so that he, as it were, lifted him up into the air, to be the sport of conflicting winds, and to be driven from one misery to another; and his whole body was dissolving with excessive heat and debility, as if by the fire of the divine indignation: nay, he thought himself sure, that God intended to pursue him to the grave with these extreme miseries. But in that house appointed for all living, he hoped to be at ease, and that the Lord would not stretch out his hand against him beyond the grave: though some would interpret his miserable death as a token of his final destruction; and exult over him, upon the supposition that he was thus proved to be a wicked man: or, though many lamented a man's deliverance by death from pain, as if it were destruction.

V. 25—31. These events were the more overwhelming to Job; because they were so contrary to his expectation. He was conscious, however, and could appeal to God, that he had always sympathized with the afflicted and relieved the poor, and never oppressed them: and on this ground he had hoped for much comfort, when these dark and dreadful trials came upon him. This astonishing change so affected him, that he spent his time in mourning as one immured from the light of the sun: nor could he help crying out in the bitterness of his soul, even in the midst of those who condemned him. He was no longer fit for the society of men; but he was driven into solitude, or caused to associate with noxious and ominous creatures, like dragons or owls, as if they were his relatives and friends. His skin was become black by the effect of his boils, his bones were burned with a fever; and his joyful praises, which he used to accompany with the harp or timbrel, were turned into doleful lamentations.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—14.

All earthly honour, prosperity, and comfort, are precarious: and 'they build too low who build beneath the skies.' But if a contrast, so affecting as this narrative exhibits, may be drawn between the summit of earthly felicity and the depth of earthly misery; how inconceivable must be the distance betwixt eternal life and eternal punishment! and if the thoughts of former enjoyments greatly enhance the

CHAP. XXXI.

Job solemnly, before God, protests, that he was not guilty of unchastity or dishonesty, 1—12. Of unkindness to his servants, or to the poor, 13—22. anguish of present sufferings; in what a wretched case will the wealthy, honoured, and self-indulgent sinner be, when it shall be said to him, "Remember that thou in thy life—time hadst thy good things!" The vicious and debauched, who live in sloth and riot, by fraud and rapine, hate those who attempt to make them labour and live honestly, or punish them for their crimes. A few individuals prosper by iniquity, and live in splendour: but multitudes are by their vices reduced to the most extreme misery. They forfeit their characters, as well as ruin their circumstances and constitutions: every one suspects and becomes averse to employ them: their lives are wasted in brutality, fraud, and extravagance: and for the peace of society, they must be confined, destroyed, or driven away, like ravenous beasts. In distant regions or desolate places they drag on a miserable existence, without the comforts, and almost without the necessities, of life. Their folly and their wickedness are alike great: their present condition and future prospects are both deplorable. A Christian, indeed, must neither disdain or despair of any fellow creature, nor reproach men for their poverty, nor indulge resentment; and they who, through incapacity or the imbecility of old age, cannot work, have a right to be maintained by others: yet men may persevere in so base a conduct, that no wise man can employ, trust, or favour them; and whilst they continue in their vile practices, they are less entitled to regard than the meanest of the inoffensive and useful brute creatures. There are numbers who cannot, by any human wisdom or power, be preserved from present and future ruin: we may lament to see them dying with disease and in misery; but we cannot make them willing to be done good to: and in some scenes, it is equally surprising and afflicting to notice the multitudes which answer to this description. As, however, some of every sort may be rescued from ruin, it is our business to do what we can in the use of proper means; and to look to him with whom all things are possible for an effectual blessing. But they who are themselves base and foolish, train up families of children of the same vile character, inured to vice, and fitted to be the nuisance of society. So that except some method be devised to prevent the rising generations, one after another, from being corrupted, no extensive reformation can take place; and, alas! the sword of the magistrate will still find abundance of employment. These are they that take the lead in reviling, insulting, and opposing the wise and pious reformer, or the active magistrate: as much as they dare, and as soon as authority is at all relaxed, they give a loose to their insolence: and if such as have rebuked or chastised their crimes fall into affliction, they will show their enmity by every kind of indignity. But instead of regretting this circumstance, we should rejoice if we are despised, reviled, and hated only by wicked men: and we should look "unto Jesus, who endured the contradiction of sinners against himself;" and against whom, (as against Job,) the very objects were gathered together, to insult, mock, and spit upon him. Considering who he was, and what we are; and how much lighter our sufferings are than those which he endured, we may well be ashamed to complain of the insults and injuries we experience.

When inward temptations unite with outward calamities, the soul often loses its firmness, is hurried as in a tempest, and is filled with confusion. It then becomes difficult to speak or complain, without seeming "to charge God "foolishly," as if he dealt too rigorously with us and were become our enemy. But woe be to those who have him for an enemy! They will not only be brought with others to the grave, but to the bottomless pit of destruction. Compared with this perdition of ungodly men, what are all outward or even inward temporal afflictions? If our whole bodies were filled with exquisite pain, and were rendered loathsome by disease; if we were shut up in a dungeon, driven from society, or thrown into the mire; if our friends were become cruel, and our enemies triumphant; if the Lord frowned, Satan tempted, and the world loaded us with infamy: yet, while we retained a hope that death would terminate our sorrows, and bring us to a state of happiness, we might well mingle joy with our mourning, and thanksgiving with our lamentations. No chastening, however, seemeth to be joyous, but grievous; and unexpected afflictions are hardest to endure. They will therefore mar our cheerfulness: but we should not yield to despondency; nor convert grounds of consolation into topics of discouragement. If none are disposed to pity us as we have sympathised with others, our correcting God pities us, "even as a father pitieth his own children." But as the grave is the house appointed for all living, let us look more to the things of eternity. Then the believer who is here a mourner, will take his golden harp, and joyfully celebrate the praises of redeeming love.

guilt, so it would have been difficult for him to prove his innocence: he was therefore compelled, as it were, to answer upon oath, that he solemnly appealed to God that he was not guilty of the charge which had been brought against him. He adduced a variety of particulars, to obviate the suspicion of any secret iniquity having been committed by him: and he showed that he acted upon principle in his whole conduct: and that he understood the spiritual nature of God's commandments, as reaching to the thoughts and intents of the heart, far better than almost any of those did to whom the written law was delivered, and among whom it was preserved. He first appealed to God, that he had avoided all unchastity, and had kept to the original institution of marriage; and that he strictly inhibited his eyes from gazing upon any woman, however beautiful, to lust after her, though she were unmarried or his inferior. He had covenanted with them, that they should be confined to the beholding of the beauties of creation, and the examining of the works of God, and not be allowed to admit a licentious desire into his heart: and no doubt his imagination was equally forbidden to entertain the polluting thought by which lust is conceived, and sin is produced. For however man might excuse these things, Job knew that God abhorred them: and if he were guilty of them, he could expect nothing from above, but destruction in another world; and perhaps some strange punishment in this life, such as befel the inhabitants of Sodom: for God saw all his ways and marked his steps, though he might conceal them from man. In this chapter, and in the twenty-ninth, vastly more is contained of genuine purity and equity; of condescending, liberal, self-denying kindness to the poor and needy; of superiority to the love of the world and the fear of men, and all corrupt motives, as well as of sterling piety, than in all the writings of pagan antiquity combined. The standard of duty is fixed as high as in the moral law, and explained as spiritually as in our Saviour's sermon on the mount. And the entire coincidence of this ancient book even with the new testament, in this essential matter, as well as in the grand doctrines of revealed religion, and the effect of them on the practice of true believers, forms a striking proof, that it was "written by inspiration from God;" that all the sacred writers spake "as they were moved by the Holy Ghost:" and that true religion has been the same for substance in every age from the beginning. Job's conduct as a magistrate, in his public capacity, was before exhibited; this chapter contains an avowal of his habitual conduct in private life.

V. 5—8. Job next solemnly protested, that he had not yielded to covetous desires. He had not dealt fraudulently; or imposed on others by vain pretences; or hastily seized unjust advantages; or turned aside from the direct path of honesty. He had not looked on his neighbour's goods to covet them, and then devise means to obtain them: for this seems to be the meaning of the phrase, "If mine heart hath walked after mine eyes." There was no blot of this kind on his hands. In this matter he desired an impartial trial, and that God would know or make known and approve, his integrity: but if he were guilty, he submitted to the sentence as most just; that all the remnant of his ruined fortunes should be seized, and every production of his labour torn from him, even as his offspring had been cut off.

V. 9—12. Job next declared, that his heart had not been deceived by the beauty or blandishments of another man's wife, to entertain a sinful affection for her, or to wait for an opportunity of committing adultery with her. If he ever had attempted such a crime, he was willing that his guilt should be detected, by his own wife becoming the vilest slave or even concubine to others. But as he should abhor the thought of her being so wicked or so wretched; so he equally abhorred the thought of adultery: for he knew that it was not only hateful to God, but destructive to society, and deserved to be punished by the civil magistrates; as it would consume like a fire, not only the soul of him who committed it, but every thing valuable in social and domestic life.

V. 13—15. Not only was Job clear from the guilt of cruelly oppressing his servants; but he did not disdain to hearken to their cause, when they objected to his orders, or complained of his conduct towards them: being ever ready to do them justice and make them easy. He knew that before his Master in heaven, he could not vindicate any oppressions of an inferior, when He should arise to visit the transgressions of sinners upon them: and he was sensible that they had a right to equity and kindness: being equally the creatures of God, partakers of the same rational nature, and descended from the same common parents with himself. Compare this statement, and the motives here adduced, with the conduct of the most civilized pagans towards their slaves, and the opinions of their strictest moralists on this subject: and note the immense disparity between natural principles and that religion which God has revealed!

V. 16—23. Instead of having oppressed the poor, the fatherless, and the widow, as it had been asserted, Job could appeal to God that he had ever been their kind friend. He had not only supplied their urgent necessities, but regarded their reasonable desires; and had not left the poor widow to behold, with unavailing wishes, the abundance of which she might not partake. He had shared his provision with the fatherless and destitute: for he had been educated to such maxims and habits; and, from his earliest youth, he had been accustomed to bring up poor orphans, and to counsel, protect, and provide for the widows. He had made clothes of his wool for those who were destitute of proper covering, that being made comfortable by him they might pray for him. And if he had ever used his authority and influence to defraud the fatherless, he would consent that God should manifest his iniquity, by causing his arm to wither and drop off from his shoulder-blade. But indeed he feared a more dreadful destruction from God in another world: and as the mightiest princes could not endure before his holy Majesty, this fear alone was sufficient to restrain him from such iniquities. As the most of Job's servants had been killed, and the rest were disobedient to him; and as his cattle had been taken away from him; so it was a comfort to him to reflect, that he had behaved well to the one and made a good use of the other whilst he had them: and especially that he had acted, in these respects, not from regard to man, but from the fear of God, and reverence to his authority. In what other ancient book, not written by an Israelite, shall we meet with such kind sentiments concerning the lower orders in society?

V. 24—28. Job had been very rich; but he was conscious that he had neither gloried, rejoiced, nor confided in his wealth; nor thought himself, on that account, a wiser, better, or happier man. But considering himself as a steward, in respect of his possessions, and expecting to account for them, he had shunned this common idolatry; and he had also entirely kept himself from all gross idolatry, open or secret: he had never in the smallest instance given that honour to the sun or moon, those splendid and useful creatures, which belonged to the Creator alone. (Marg. Ref.) For he knew that this was a denial of the unity, sovereignty, and exclusive right to adoration, of the God above. The words rendered "an iniquity to be punished by the judge," have led some to think that this book was written after the giving of the Mosaic law: but the circumstance of no idolatry, except that of the sun and moon, being mentioned, is a much more probable argument in favour of a higher antiquity. The judicial law for punishing idolatry by the magistrate, seems to have been intended for Israel alone, as under the Sinai-covenant. The plural of the same word is used and rendered judges when the punishment of adulterers is spoken of; (11.) Adultery is a crime which tends to destroy the peace of society, and as such falls directly under the cognizance of magistrates, but idolatry is committed immediately against God: and if our translation be just, He, as the judge of the world, seems rather meant than the civil magistrate. But indeed, the passage is rendered by the old translators, perhaps more properly, "an iniquity to be condemned."

V. 29—32. So far from hating his enemies, or revenging himself on them, Job declared, that as he valued the favour of God above, he had not allowed himself to rejoice or triumph when mischief befel them, or to wish them any harm. Nay, when his dependents were so enraged at those who injured him, that they were ready to devour them, he would by no means permit them to follow the impulse of their vindictive rage. At the same time, in imitation of faithful Abraham, he was ever ready to entertain strangers and travellers, as circumstances required. Bishop Hall thus paraphrases the thirty-first verse. ‘ If the people of my house were not so taken up with the offices of my hospitality to others, that they had no leisure to feed themselves, and therefore complained for the want of that flesh which they dressed for others.’—The words may be rendered, “ Who will give us of his flesh : we shall not be satisfied.”

V. 33, 34. So far from being a hypocrite, Job was conscious that he had not, after the manner of Adam and his posterity, attempted to conceal or justify his faults : but he was ever open to conviction, and ready to confess his offence to God or man, as there was occasion ; not fearing reproach or contempt on that account ; ‘ Whereby it is evident that he justified himself before men, and not before God.’ Nor was he ever induced by the fear of the multitude or the contempt of the great families around, to neglect any part of his duty as a magistrate.

dejection of a criminal who dreaded condemnation. Upon the whole, this protestation and appeal were well grounded and honourable to Job's character. St. Paul in different places makes similar appeals: but in a more modest and reverential manner. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 38—40. As Job was about to conclude, another particular seems to have occurred to him, concerning which he had not exculpated himself. He had never seized upon lands, by putting the owner to death as a criminal, and confiscating his estate; or by any other oppression or fraud. Nor had he reaped his harvest, without duly paying his labourers their wages. If he had, let God avenge it, by rendering the whole accursed, producing nothing but useless noxious weeds. With this Job concluded, as with an air of triumph and confidence.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—12.

“The grace of God, which bringeth salvation,” hath in all ages, taught men “to deny ungodliness and worldly lusts, and to live soberly, righteously, and godly in this present world.” Repentance and faith produce hatred of sin, and love to God and man; and our interest in redeeming love is evidenced by a course of conscientious obedience. In general, however, it is best to let our actions speak for us: and though in some cases we owe to ourselves and to the cause of God a solemn protestation of innocence as to those crimes of which we are falsely accused, yet this is seldom made without some real or apparent ostentation. Every wickedness is first conceived in the heart; where ten thousand enormities are devised which are never perpetrated, being prevented by fear of man, regard to character, or want of opportunity and ability. The eye, the ear, and all the senses are the common inlets of those evil thoughts which excite inward concupiscence; we must therefore keep a strict guard upon them and upon the imagination also, if we would keep out of the way of temptation and transgression.

CHAP. XXXII.

Job's three friends being silenced, Elihu speaks, and is angry both with Job and them, 1—5. He excuses his interference, though young; because great and aged men are not always wise, 6—10. He complains, that the reasonings of the disputants were not suited to produce conviction, 11—15. He shows that he is earnestly desirous of speaking; and declares that he will be impartial, 16—22.

SO these three men ceased * to answer Job, because he was ^a righteous in his own eyes.

While we pray to the Lord “to turn away our eyes from beholding vanity,” we should be careful to have all our senses and faculties occupied about lawful things: and lest secrecy, or the hope of impunity entice us, we should habitually recollect, that “the Lord sees our ways and counts all our steps.” Without strict honesty and fidelity in all our dealings, we can have no good evidence of true godliness. Yet how many who profess to believe the Gospel of Christ, are unable to bear this touchstone! Alas! most men haste to deceive: they covet riches, “their heart walketh after their eyes,” and they turn aside; manifest blots defile their hands; God sees and man often detects their dishonesty; and it is well if the ruin of their substance prevent the ruin of their souls. Alas, that adultery also should be so common amongst professed Christians! It is indeed highly desirable that the authority of the magistrate should stop the spread of this fire, which destroys domestic peace and every principle of purity, honesty, truth, and conscience; and which often provokes retaliation, till whole nations are filled with wickedness. But, if men suffer the criminals to escape, the Judge of the world will surely call them to a severe account: and this is sufficient to put all that fear him on their guard, lest their hearts should at any time be deceived.

V. 13—40.

Genuine religion uniformly teaches us to treat inferiors and domestics with humanity, equity, and affection; to bear with their faults, to sympathize in their troubles, to hearken to their complaints, and to seek their present and future welfare: remembering that they are our brethren, as near to the great Creator, and as capable of eternal salvation as ourselves. It disposes us likewise to kindness as well as justice towards the poor: to consult their inclinations, to share our comforts with them, whether we have abundance or only a moderate provision; and to seek an interest in the grateful prayers of the fatherless and the widow, by sparing from our own indulgence, to feed, clothe, educate, or protect them. How contrary then must it be to Christianity, for men to enslave, oppress, and plunder the poor, because they “see their help in the gate,” and have the law of the land and the countenance of the ruler on their side! A worse punishment, than the falling off of the arm from the shoulder-blade awaits such oppressors, especially when they bear and disgrace the Christian name; even “destruction from the Lord, before whose highness they cannot endure.” These crimes spring from covetousness, which makes gold a man’s confidence, hope, and joy; as if his life consisted in “the abundance of his possessions. But divine grace destroys this idolatry, by teaching us to seek our whole happiness from God; to subordinate all other affections to the love of him; and to receive and use all worldly possessions as his stewards, and to his glory. Yet it is to be feared, that but few prosperous Christians can properly appeal to a heart-searching God, that they have not rejoiced because their gains were great. Through the determination to be rich, numbers fall into temptations which ruin their souls, or pierce them through with many sorrows. This is the idolatry to which we are most tempted: but it is a great favour to be preserved from all the false and fashionable kinds of religion, which from age to age supplant “the truth as it is in Jesus” and its sanctifying effects, and eventually prove “a denial of God above.” The Holy Spirit always hath taught his children to do good against evil, to bless, and not to curse their enemies, to repress revenge, to forgive as they hope to be forgiven, to avoid all rejoicing in calamities, and to restrain others from revenge and cruelty. In respect of all these things, and in every particular, we should examine with prayer, how far we are followers of this ancient believer? Whether we use hospitality without grudging, and are ready for every good work? Whether the fear of reproach or resentment, from the great or the many, do not induce us to neglect our known duty? Whether we possess any ill-gotten property to cry out against us? or whether we deprive the labourer of his wages? If our conscience testify for us in these and similar inquiries, we should give God the praise, but we may have confidence now before his mercy-seat; and may hope to stand with humble boldness, as justified believers before his judgment-seat: we need fear no adversary, or accusation, or scrutiny; for “who is he that condemneth? It is God that justifieth:” and the slanders of our enemies will then be our crown: as princes we shall go near unto him, and enter into his glory, and sit down with him on his throne. But let us all judge ourselves, and not cover our sins as Adam; and where we are guilty, let us seek forgiveness; entreating “the Lord to have mercy upon us, and write all his laws in our hearts,” by the influences of his Holy Spirit.

NOTES.

Job’s opponents were at length silenced, though not convinced; they could not answer his arguments, but they retained their unfavourable opinion of him; and they declined all further dispute, because he was righteous in his own eyes, and determined as they thought at any rate to vindicate himself.

V. 2—5. It is evident, that others besides the disputants were present during this controversy, and Elihu among the rest. His name signifies My God is he. He was the son of Barachel the Buzite, of the kindred of Ram, which some suppose to have been the original name of Abraham, to whom Buz was nearly related; though others think that Aram, the son of Kemuel, is meant. (Gen. xxii. 21.) Many singular opinions have been formed concerning Elihu: yet it is evident, that he was a young man of singular modesty and wisdom; but nothing more. He came nearer the true state of the case, than any other of the contending parties: but he evidently bore too hard on Job, and in some instances put also harsh constructions on his words. He, however, charged him with no crime, except his misconduct in the management of the argument: and in this respect he was justly displeased both with him and with his friends. He alleged with truth, that Job had been more anxious to vindicate his own character, than to clear up the justice and goodness of God in afflicting him: and that his friends had persisted in condemning him as a hypocrite, though unable to refute his doctrine or to answer his arguments. But as he was younger than they, he had modestly waited till the controversy was dropped, before he attempted to declare his opinion.

V. 6—14. Young men are commonly most forward to dispute, and aged men best qualified to be moderators; but here the case was reversed. Elihu allowed it to be a good general rule, that they who had had the longest experience should speak first, and teach wisdom to the young. But there is a rational soul in man, and God giveth wisdom, both natural and spiritual, as he pleaseth; and facts prove, that the greatest and most aged are not always the wisest: this reflection therefore at length emboldened him to state his opinion. He had carefully listened to the arguments of the disputants, as long as they could find any thing to say: but he found they could neither convict Job of iniquity, nor refute his doctrine. Indeed Elihu thought that they were left to be thus foiled, lest they should glory in their own wisdom, and improperly exult over Job, as proved to be a wicked man, by the testimony of God in his dealings with him. Or, as some explain the words, they reluctantly yielded that they were overcome, by counting it their wisdom to be silent, and leaving it to God to confute Job by continuing his afflictions. But as Job had not spoken against Elihu, he purposed to answer him in a different manner; and without attempting to prove him a hypocrite, he would reprove some things in which he was evidently culpable.

V. 15—17. These verses favour the opinion, that Elihu was the writer of this book: for he seems here to address himself as an historian to the reader, rather than as a speaker to that company. He observed, that the disputants had been amazed to hear Job so confidently protest his own integrity, and perplexed to reconcile his situation with the divine justice and goodness, unless he were a wicked man. They had given up the argument, as if deprived of speech; and they seemed to look for some one else to throw light upon the subject. So that he had full liberty to speak his sentiments; having patiently waited for this opening.

CHAP. XXXIII.

V. 18—22. Elihu's mind was full of thoughts, in consequence of his having for a long time silently reflected on the subject, and he was inwardly constrained to speak. With much uneasiness he had refrained himself: his mind was agitated by his own meditations in the manner that fermenting wine is ready to burst the bottle when it cannot have vent; so that it would be a refreshment to him to speak, though it should not profit them. He intended to be impartial, and not to flatter either party, though they were his seniors and superiors; but he would freely reprove what he thought wrong in them, without respect of persons. Indeed he was not used to give flattering titles to any man; and he knew it would displease his Maker; and therefore, as he feared his awful displeasure, and desired mercy from him, he was determined to avoid them. The original word signifies, to give an additional name, as a title of distinction.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The self-flattery of the human heart often prevents men from being convinced of their errors, or from acknowledging that they are such; so that even when not determined at all events to have the last word; they will imagine or pretend some plausible reason for declining an argument in which they have been foiled, whilst they hold their sentiments and criminate their opponents. Indeed it is not worth while to reason with the pertinacious and self-sufficient, or with such as are righteous in their own eyes: yet sometimes they who are accepted with God, and have truth and justice on their side, are unjustly charged with obstinacy and self-confidence. An unprejudiced by-stander frequently understands controverted points better than the eager disputants; in almost all contests much may be re-proved on both sides: and they who endeavour to distinguish betwixt what is right and what is wrong among all parties, will seldom be approved by the zealots of any, but will commonly come nearest to the truth. If we perceive others in a fault, it is generally advisable to mention shows how God instructs men by dreams, afflictions, and messengers; that repenting they may find mercy, 14—30. He calls on Job to answer further, or to attend to his discourse, 31—33.

it before them: and it is not sinful anger, if we are greatly displeased, to hear God dishonoured, his truths misrepresented, and men unjustly condemned or fatally deceived. It belongs to the aged to take the lead in conversation, and to teach wisdom: and modesty, and deference towards seniors and superiors always become the young. Yet reason is common to man, and God communicates both natural abilities and spiritual gifts, in measure as he pleases. “So that great men are not always wise, neither do the aged understand judgment:” and by an attention to the word, and a dependence upon the Spirit of God, the young may become wiser than the aged, than their teachers, and their rulers. But this wisdom will render them “swift to hear, slow to speak,” and disposed to give others a patient attention, though they seem to argue inconclusively, and to say little to the purpose. However full we may think ourselves of suitable matter, for the conviction of others, and the termination of a controversy; and whatever uneasiness we feel in keeping silence, when others are discoursing, as we think, in a manner contrary to truth, we should remember, that it is indecent, and savours of arrogance to interrupt them. Nay, if we were sure that the Spirit of God suggested to us what we were about to say, we ought to refrain, until it fairly come to our turn to speak: for ‘the spirits of the prophets are subject to “the prophets,” and God is the source of order, and not of confusion. But the faithful minister of God, who is filled with the knowledge of his truth and will, and with zeal for his glory and compassion for souls, must be greatly pained by every attempt to silence him: nay, indeed he cannot be silenced; whatever be the consequence, he cannot but speak the things which he has heard and believed. Times and seasons he will regard; but he must speak, that he may be refreshed, whether men will hear or forbear: and he must speak faithfully, without respect of persons, or knowing to give flattering titles: for “he is not a man-pleaser, but a servant of Jesus Christ;” and is ambitious, whether present or absent, of being accepted of him.

NOTES.

CHAP. XXXIII. V. 1—7. Elihu had given his reasons for speaking, and here he demanded the attention of Job in particular, (for Job had sufficiently answered his friends.) He did not speak in haste or passion, but deliberately and with recollection. He meant to speak his undisguised sentiments, in the plainest and most instructive manner: he was the creature of God, dependent on him, and accountable to him; from whose life-giving Spirit he derived his being and rational nature. Job might therefore stand up before him to make the best of his cause. He had desired an impartial judge to be appointed in God's stead to decide upon his appeal: and behold here was one according to his wish, a man like himself, who would neither terrify nor hurt him; as the glorious God might have done, if he had entered into judgment with him; nay, he would not bear so hard on him as his other friends had done.

V. 8—11. Elihu had heard Job's words, and did not condemn him upon suspicion, as his other friends had done. He did not accuse him of being a hypocrite; but as having spoken language unbecoming a man of piety. He had so strenuously insisted upon his own integrity, that he seemed to say, "I am clean without transgression, I am innocent: neither is there any iniquity in me." Job had not said exactly these words: nay, he had avowed the contrary doctrine: but he had used incautious expressions that admitted of such a construction. The other words charged upon him were nearly what he had spoken. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 12, 13. In this thing at least Elihu maintained, that Job had been culpable; he had charged God foolishly and unjustly, as if his dealings with him were causelessly severe. But he ought to have recollected the infinite greatness of the almighty Sovereign; so that it was the height of madness and presumption to contend with him. He gives no account of his conduct; and which of his creatures hath a right to demand an explanation of his reasons, in those things which he sees good to conceal?

V. 14—18. In many things God acts as a Sovereign, who explains not the meaning of his orders; but in general he shows himself a merciful and kind Father. He does not ask men what methods he should use, but he employs such as are most proper. He speaks to them in various ways, and with frequent repetitions: but they are so dull, careless, and prejudiced, that they perceive not his meaning. Elihu lived before there was a written revelation, and therefore that grand medium of communication is not mentioned: but God then frequently spake to men in dreams and visions; and thus in the dark and retired hours of the night, he caused them even in their sleep to attend to him, and deeply impressed his instructions on their memories. This was intended, not to enable men to understand the reasons of the divine dispensations, but to withdraw them from their sinful purposes, and from their proud rebellion; that being humbled in repentance, and made sensible of their guilt and vileness, they might be preserved from that destruction of soul and body into which they were about to be hurried. Nay, the long-suffering of God, by preserving men from sudden and violent death, when living in sin, kept back their souls from hell, and gave them space for repentance.

V. 19—26. When men disregard the warnings, and despise the patience of God, he often sends severe afflictions. And if Job had been afflicted on this account, instead of murmuring against God and justifying himself, he ought to have considered what sins he had committed, and what duties he had neglected. For God in love often confined men to beds of sickness, and filled them with exquisite pain in every part, causing them to loathe even the most necessary or delicious food, and reducing them to mere skeletons: and whilst it appeared, that the body was about to drop into the grave, the poor sufferer was perhaps affrighted, lest the soul should fall into the hands of the destroyers. Yet all this tended to good, and often terminated well: especially if some pious person were sent as the messenger of God, (as Elihu hoped he was to Job,) to be an interpreter of the painful dispensation, and of the truth and will of God, and to show the sufferer the way of pardon and peace. As such interpreters were scarce, not one amongst a thousand being capable of the service, they were the more to be valued: for they would show the sinner the justice of God in his sufferings and condemnation; his way of pardoning and justifying the penitent believer; his sincerity and faithfulness to his promises; and the way of holiness. Such a messenger frequently proved the instrument of the man's conversion: and the Lord in mercy commanded his deliverance from the pit of destruction, through the ransom or atonement which he had appointed and revealed, even that of the promised Messiah: and sometimes restored his health, vigour, and comeliness, as if he were become young again. Thus the sinner was taught to pray unto God, and he forgave him; he had comfortable communion with him at his mercy-seat, and hoped to see his face with joy in heaven: and would be graciously recompensed for all the works of righteousness, which he had performed in humble faith and love. Some interpret this Messenger or Angel, of Christ himself, the Interpreter of God's will to man, the chief among the ten thousands of his saints and servants. But as in general He comes to men by his messengers or ministers; and as their instructions and encouragements are deduced from his mediation, and are made effectual by his gracious presence; it does not much signify, whether we interpret the passage, of the messengers of God pointing to the Saviour, or the Saviour revealing himself by their ministry. It is equally immaterial, whether the words, "Deliver him from going down to the pit," be considered as the language of Christ's intercession, pleading the ransom of his blood, in behalf of the sinner: or the words of the Father accepting of this plea, and giving command to save the sinner, satisfied with that appointed ransom: for it cannot reasonably be doubted, but that Elihu had reference to it; though he might also intend the sacrifices which prefigured the great atonement.

V. 27—30. Elihu further showed, that God always observed the ways of men; and when any sinner humbly confessed his transgressions of his just and good laws, as unreasonable and unprofitable, being ashamed and weary of them, and grieved and self-condemned for them; he would deliver his soul from going down into the pit of destruction, and he should live to enjoy his favour. Thus he brought back sinners from the brink of ruin, to be enlightened in the living and the life-giving knowledge of salvation. He awakened their consciences by visions; he visited them with afflictions, he sent them his messengers and his Gospel; and by his goodness he thus led them to repentance and salvation. Therefore Job had no reason to think that God was become his enemy; but to hope to derive great advantage from his calamities.

V. 31—33. Elihu again demanded Job's attention, as he had much more to say; but if he could answer any thing to what he had urged, he would have him speak before he proceeded: for he greatly desired to find that he was a righteous man, and to clear up his aspersed character. But if Job could not refute his charge, let him be silent, and he would proceed to instruct him further in true wisdom. It seems, that Job was so far convinced by his discourse, that he would not attempt an answer.

CHAP. XXXIV.

Elihu calls on the wise to judge in the cause; and charges Job with arraignment the divine justice, 1—9. He affirms, that the all-powerful and all-perfect God cannot do iniquity; and vindicates his dealings with men, 10—30. He shows Job, that he ought to humble himself before God, and sharply reproves his words, 31—37.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—13.

We ought always to discourse upon religious subjects with seriousness, recollection, candour, sincerity, and plainness; if we expect to be heard with attention, and to convince and instruct others. When we have evident truth on our side, we may often convince our opponents that they cannot stand before the tribunal of God, by showing them that they cannot justify their conduct before a fellow sinner; who can neither dismay nor hurt them, while he pleads against them in the behalf of God. In the heat of controversy, and when greatly afflicted and tempted, we are apt to utter words which cannot be justified; and if a worse construction be put upon them than we intended, we need not wonder, and should not be offended. Public offences should be publicly rebuked or retracted, to prevent scandal; we may allow a man's general character to be good, and yet reprove him for particular offences. If we seem to justify our whole conduct and murmur against God, in this we are not just: for when we adopt this conduct the subject impeaches the Sovereign, and the foolish sinful worm arraigns the conduct of the wise and righteous Lord of all! The infinite power and authority of God should deter us from thus contending with him; for he will not, he cannot, submit his conduct to our judgment. But when we consider that he excels the noblest of his creatures in all things else, as much as in majesty and greatness, and is in all respects consummate perfection; we must perceive, that every objection to his dispensations is rebellion and ingratitude.

V. 14—33.

The general tendency of all the Lord's dealings with men, is to lead them to repent and turn unto him: but the proud careless rebel does not regard, though he speak to him again and again. The works of creation proclaim his eternal power and Godhead, and leave all those without excuse, who neither worship him nor are thankful. He speaks by conscience; but its voice is silenced by the clamorous demands of men's lusts and passions. Terrifying dreams convey forcibly salutary alarms, but unless the Lord open the ear and seal the instruction, they are speedily forgotten. The judgments of God on others have a warning voice to us; and should serve to withdraw us from our sinful purposes, and to induce us to humble ourselves before him, that we may be kept from the pit of destruction: whilst his merciful protection of us, when others are cut off and we are in danger, should lead us to repentance. When these methods are ineffectual, sharp afflictions become the voice of God. Wasting sickness and excruciating pain mar our relish of every comfort, and remind us of death and eternity. This proclaims the vanity of the world, the evil of sin, the power of God's wrath, our need of mercy, and the danger to which we are exposed. But how many repeatedly endure all this, yet remain unhumbled and unchanged! It is however a token for good, when the servants and ministers of God are sent to interpret to the afflicted his dispensations and word. This is a good service, and it is lamentable that so few are qualified for it and take pleasure in it: and it is a most important additional charity, when the sick in hospitals are diligently attended by faithful instructors; as it often proves the means of salvation to their souls. But Christ himself is the only effectual Interpreter; by his Spirit he shows the sinner the way of acceptance and salvation; who believing, receives the gift of righteousness and partakes of sanctification: and through the ransom of the atoning blood, his prayers are answered, his soul is rescued, and perhaps his health and comfort are restored: he comes with joy before the mercy-seat, and beholds by faith the countenance of his reconciled Father; and waits for the Saviour's appearing to judge the world, with animating hope of receiving that crown of righteousness, which is laid up for him in heaven. In short, the eyes of the Lord are upon all the ways of the children of men: he sees them when committing their secret abominations; he sees them when, convinced of guilt, they condemn themselves, abhor their crimes, are covered with shame, and filled with fear of wrath; and when weary of their sins they long for deliverance: and he will assuredly have mercy upon, and save them. By what means soever we are kept back from the pit to be "enlightened with the light of the living," we shall bless the Lord for them at last, and should bless him for them now, though painful and distressing. To the end of our lives corrections are the needful and salutary means of keeping us near, or bringing us nearer, to God, and as such, are not only to be submitted to, but to be valued as pledges of love: for it is better to be "chastened of the Lord, than to be condemned with the world." Finally, we should desire to justify others, as far as consists with truth: but a wise man will be afraid of too strenuously justifying himself; he will rather hearken to reproof and receive instruction, that he may increase in wisdom and knowledge.

1 Is. xi. 2-5. let us ^d know among ourselves what is good.

NOTES.

CHAP. XXXIV. V. 1—4. Elihu, having paused to hear whether Job had any thing to answer, proceeded to call upon those present to attend to his discourse. He addressed them as men of wisdom and discernment; and doubted not but that their understandings would decide whether the expressions which Job had used were proper or not, as readily as the palate distinguishes the taste of meat. He desired therefore that certain principles might be laid down, according to which they might form a judgment: and that they would confer among themselves, and come to an explicit determination on that subject.

V. 5—9. In vindicating his character, Job had used language which seemed to imply an intention of fully justifying himself; and whilst he complained that God dealt rigorously with him, he expressed himself so vehemently, that he appeared to charge him with injustice; when urged to confess his crimes, he still more earnestly protested his righteousness, and a determination not to accuse himself falsely; and in his bitter complainings he spake of his wounds as incurable, without admitting that his transgressions had deserved them. These expressions induced Elihu to conclude that Job allowed himself in an astonishing license of language: that he took pleasure in scoffing at the works and truths of God, as well as in scorning the warnings and counsels of his friends; and that he agreed in principles and practice with wicked men, whose company he seemed to prefer, and whose conduct he encouraged; having indeed asserted that no profit would accrue to those who delighted in the service of God. Yet Job by no means intended all that Elihu charged upon him. He had not spoken precisely all the words which Elihu, quoting from memory, attributed to him; those which he had used might admit of a more favourable construction; and other parts of his discourse plainly showed that his deliberate judgment widely differed from the sentiments apparently conveyed by some of his detached expressions. He had repeatedly owned that he was a sinner; and he spake of the wicked as reserved to the day of wrath and destruction. (Marg. Ref.) But Elihu did not condemn Job as a hypocrite, and he, upon reflection, would be conscious that he had spoken unadvisedly; he therefore quietly submitted to his reproof: choosing, as we may suppose, rather to bear more blame than he deserved, than to vindicate himself when he knew that he had been criminal.

V. 10—15. Elihu next laid down the principle by which he desired that Job's conduct might be tried, namely: It must appear to every pious mind, impious and blasphemous to intimate that God was capable of committing injustice: but whatever expressions seemed to imply that he punished without cause, partook of this impiety; and as Job's words implied this charge, they must be condemned. On the contrary it was certain, that the righteous Judge of all would render to every man according to his works; punishing no one above his deserts, nor suffering any of the wicked to escape with impunity; yet graciously rewarding the good works of the penitent and believing.—And surely none could think that the almighty Sovereign of the world would pervert judgment! His perfections and authority being underived, independent, and absolute, he must be all-sufficient for his own glory and felicity, he could not be biassed by fear or partiality. Indeed, if he were disposed to exercise rigorous justice, and to set his heart upon or against man: the world was so absolutely at his disposal, that he needed only to recal the spirit or soul, and withdraw the breath that he had given, and all the inhabitants of the earth would perish without being able to make the least resistance.

V. 16—19. In the next place Elihu appealed to Job himself, who was reputed to be a man of understanding. Could he suppose that the Lord resembled those earthly princes, who hate right and abuse their authority, and who are unfit to rule, being the scourges of mankind? If he abhorred that idea, would he allow God to be most just, and yet condemn his conduct in afflicting him? It would be highly criminal and extremely imprudent to revile an earthly monarch as a tyrant, or even his nobles as iniquitous and oppressive; though the charge might be just, and a prophet might very properly prefer it. How impious and infatuated must it then be to accuse the almighty God in such a manner, whose justice is as absolute as his authority; and who in perfect impartiality regards the poor as much as the rich, having formed both as his creatures, and made the one poor and the other rich in his providence!

V. 20—30. Men respect the great, from dread of their resentment, as well as desire of their favour; but God could have no inducement of this kind. When he saw good to inflict vengeance, he was able to cut off the most powerful by a sudden and irresistible stroke: earthquakes or other calamities, sometimes in a moment overwhelmed whole multitudes, at midnight, when asleep, or most secure; at once they were troubled and destroyed, even the mightiest of them, without any human concurrence; (Marg. Ref.) His omnipresence and omniscience could not be evaded, nor his omnipotence resisted: yet he would punish none above their deserts, nor use his power to oppress, that any one should have just cause to institute a process against him. But whilst he crushed the mightiest without number, (or such as if paid to examine evidences,) and exalted others to their stations, he knew all their secret sins, and therefore destroyed them at once. Many he thus openly punished, for an example to others, as malefactors are scourged or executed publicly: but these were generally apostates, or impious persons, or vile hypocrites; who by their oppression of the poor, caused them to cry and pray unto him, and he heard and avenged them. In short, if he were pleased to give outward prosperity or inward peace, none could interrupt it: but if he in anger withdrew his protecting or comforting presence, none could obtain the benefit or enjoyment of it; and whole nations are as liable to these changes as individuals. Indeed one great end of all these dispensations was, to deprive ambitious hypocrites of their authority, which they sought by iniquitous means, and abused to bad purposes; ensnaring, corrupting, oppressing, or fatally prejudicing the people, over whom they aspired to reign. Even Elihu seems to have had some suspicions that Job was a dissembler; and spake as if he was at a loss how to reconcile his calamities with his character for piety; and though the case would have been plain, if he had been a hypocrite, advanced to authority, but now depressed, lest he should lead the people into sin and misery: yet he still dared not to condemn him, but hoped the best.

V. 31—37. Elihu maintained, that it behooved Job to speak and act in a far different manner under his afflictions; it was meet that any man in his situation, should express himself with humble resignation to the will of God; should consider his afflictions as a chastisement, and a call to repent of his sins; and should promise greater watchfulness against them. He ought to entreat the Lord to teach him what he did not know, and to convince him of those sins which he did not recollect; determining by divine grace to repent and forsake them. But could Job suppose, that things would be ordered according to his mind, whilst he continued so rebellious? Did he expect that God would change his plan to please him? No; he would certainly recompense him for his harsh and rash speeches and other sins, whether he accepted of, or rebelled against, the correction. This was the Lord's doing, not Elihu's; though he warned him, and advised him to retract his words and humble himself before God. Let him, however, give the best reasons for his conduct, that he was able: for hitherto any wise man would determine Job's words to have been very erroneous. He desired therefore that his conduct might be fully investigated, nay, that his heavy trials might continue till he was humbled, and brought to retract his confident self justification: for he had in fact made an excuse for wicked men, as if their conduct was not so ruinous and hateful as it really was. So that rebellion against Providence was added to his other sins: yea, he had concluded his protestation of innocence, with an air of insulting triumph over his opponents; and had multiplied his words against God himself. Job had given some ground for these charges: but Elihu evidently made the worst of his expressions, and criminated him much more than the Lord afterwards did. Several of the clauses in these verses are to us very difficult; and consequently are differently interpreted. That which appeared the most satisfactory interpretation has been chosen. Bishop Patrick paraphrases the thirty-third verse thus; 'Hast thou addressed God in this manner? Answer me that question; for God will recompense it, if thou dost despise such good counsel; which perhaps thou wilt choose to do; but so would not I. Speak therefore thy opinion.'

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—15.

It is generally prudent to conciliate the affections of all whose benefit we seek, or whose help we want, by acknowledging in them the good which they really possess; and when we address men, as endued with wisdom and piety, we cogently admonish them to act consistently with their character: nor should we withhold this tribute of respect from any, because we deem them in some respects mistaken. An appeal may safely be made to the plainest person, whose understanding is enlightened, and whose heart is sanctified by the Spirit of God, and who is well versed in the Scriptures, how far such and such sentiments, expressions, tempers, and actions, accord with the Christian character? and he will readily decide a case, when impartially stated, with more accuracy, than the most sagacious of those who are wise in this world, and lean to their own understandings. For he chooses to himself the oracles of God as his standard; and by experience, observation, and conference with his brethren, he has his senses exercised to discern good and evil, and to know, approve, and savour that which is good. It is discordant in the ears of a spiritual man, to hear men intent on justifying themselves; or reflecting on the dealings of God, as unjust or unkind; or supposing that they suffer without remedy or transgression. He listens to their words with astonishment, and is apt to suspect them of pride and contempt of God. He thinks that they imitate the example, and join themselves to the company of evil doers, and he is ready to infer, that they consider religion itself as an unprofitable thing. This jealousy for the honour of God, and deep acquaintance with the depravity of man, will indeed sometimes render pious persons too suspicious and severe in censuring such as vindicate themselves from unjust aspersions, in an unguarded manner: and thus they will fail of making due allowance for circumstances of peculiar temptation and difficulty. But the believer, when convinced that his reprover means well, and when conscious of having deserved censure, will on calm reflection, submit to such rebukes as are too rigorous, rather than engage in minute exculpation. All pious men have ever agreed, that it is delightful and profitable to serve God: they all abhor the thought of charging him with injustice: they are satisfied that his moral perfections are underived, absolute, and unchangeable, as well as his power and authority: they know that he readily could, and justly might, consign the bodies of all the millions of the human species to the dust, and their souls to destruction: and it appears to them madness to provoke him "in whom our breath is, and whose are all our ways." And whilst life and hope remain, they cannot deliberately allow, that a sinner can have cause to murmur, but are sure that he must have great cause to be thankful.

V. 16—37.

It is evident, that it must be immensely more dangerous and atrocious to arraign the conduct of God, than that of an earthly prince. Yet all our murmurs, when duly investigated, will be found to have a tendency to the blasphemous sentiment, that the Governor of the world hates right; and to condemn him who is most just! and therefore they are pregnant with rebellion. But indeed his impartiality and condescension are infinite; "he accepts not the persons of princes; nor regards the rich more than the poor." When he seeth good to punish, destruction becometh inevitable; and frequently cometh with sudden and dreadful surprise, upon the careless multitude, or the haughtiest potentate. "His eyes are upon the ways of men, and he seeth all their goings:" there is no secret cavern or midnight darkness, "where the workers of iniquity can hide themselves," or their crimes, from their omnipresent Judge; or where they may shelter themselves from his omnipotent indignation. But he will never give any man cause to appeal from his judgment, by laying upon him more than he deserves. He knows the works

CHAP. XXXV.

Elihu further reproves Job's words in justifying himself; and shows, that the effects of man's conduct extend to man alone, and not to God, 1—8. He observes, that if God hear not the cry of the oppressed, it is because they do not address him aright, 9—13. He exhorts Job to patience and trust in God, 14—16.

of all men, and sees far more evil in every one than we suspect: therefore in his most terrible judgments his justice must be acknowledged; and even when "the wicked shall be turned into hell, and all the nations that forget God;" the publishing of their crimes will demonstrate the righteousness of their dreadful doom. But the vengeance of the Almighty, either here or hereafter, will be most terrible against apostate professors; those who have deliberately rejected his authority and his Gospel; and such as have cloaked their ambitious designs under a hypocritical profession of piety. Men of these characters will perhaps be disappointed and exposed in this world, for a warning to others, and to prevent the effect of their crimes. It is, however, certain, that they who have the Lord for their adversary must eventually be wretched. But, if he be for us, who can be against us? If he give quietness who can create trouble? The slanderer's envenomed tongue, the persecutor's cruel rage, the tempter's malicious assaults, with pain, poverty, tortures, and impending death, in vain attempt to render those miserable whom God comforts; or to separate his people from his love. This "indeed is the heritage of the servants of the LORD;" but it is also proposed to the chief of sinners: and chastenings often concur with his word in warning them to flee from the wrath to come. Surely then it is meet that we should address ourselves unto God, when he afflicts us with the language of humble submission: confessing our transgressions, and praying to be further enlightened in the knowledge of his truth, and in an acquaintance with our own sinfulness; and that he would incline and enable us to repent and forsake all our sins; that "where we have done iniquity, we may do so no more." When we are brought to this frame of spirit, we shall see it unreasonable to expect that matters should be according to our minds: we shall perceive, that whether we refuse or choose, God will chasten us as much and as long as he seeth good; and probably this will be, till we kiss the rod and welcome the correction. But, alas! how often are our tempers and conduct contrary to this reasonable state of mind! When we have spoken all we know, men of understanding and wisdom will agree that we have uttered things which sprang from ignorance or error, or savoured of pride and ingratitude: nay, we shall often upon a review be conscious of it ourselves. As far as this emboldens wicked men in their crimes, or hardens them in their prejudices, it should be openly retracted; and all concerned should combine to convince the offender and bring him to repentance. This is an act of genuine friendship: but we should be careful not to do it with asperity, or to represent the words and actions of our brethren as worse than they are. It is, however, desirable for us all to be tried completely; and even to have our afflictions continued, till they have done their work: for it is better to be severely reprov'd and chastened, than to be left to persevere in rebellion, to prosper in iniquity, to triumph in error, and to multiply words and transgressions against God.

NOTES.

CHAP. XXXV. V. 1—3. As Job attempted no answer, Elihu proceeded still further to reprove his improper language. Job had laboured to prove, that there was no exact discrimination in this world betwixt the righteous and the wicked: and he seemed to Elihu to assert, that it would be no advantage to any one, as it had been none to him, to bestow pains in seeking to be cleansed from sin. This he thought equivalent to saying, "that his righteousness was more than God's:" for that he did his duty: but God did not fulfil his promises, and punished him more severely than he deserved. Job had not spoken exactly these words, and certainly had no such meaning; but he had dropped some expressions capable of being thus understood; and it was proper they should be noticed, lest others should make a bad use of them.

V. 4—8. In answer to Job, and those, whether present or absent, who were disposed to side with him, Elihu called his attention to the visible heavens, the very clouds of which were higher than he, out of his reach, and not affected by his conduct: it must then be evident, that the infinitely glorious God could not be either a gainer or loser by any of his actions: (Note, xxii. 1—4.) The most numerous and atrocious crimes which men could perpetrate, would not interrupt the divine felicity; nor could any human righteousness profit God or confer an obligation upon him. His government was therefore administered upon the purest principles of equity and wisdom, for the display of his own glorious perfections, and for the greatest good of the universe. And therefore, as the Lord acted upon such fixed and immutable principles, it was absurd and impious to suppose that he deviated from rectitude, in any particular instance, to punish those who did not deserve it: or that piety could eventually prove unprofitable.

V. 9—13. (xxiv. 12.) Job had stated that the oppressed cry out, but are not delivered, and that the oppressors remain unpunished: and Elihu, in showing how the wickedness of some men made others to suffer, attempted to account for this. The afflicted cried out indeed by reason of the power of their oppressors; but they did not repent, or seek comfort from God, who can fill the hearts of his servants with joy, and their mouths with songs of praise, in the darkest night of distress. (Marg. Ref.) The Creator had endued them with a capacity of knowing more than the beasts and fowls; having formed them capable of receiving the knowledge of his being and perfections, and thus of seeking help and comfort from him under their trouble. But they who only groaned under distresses, without repentance, faith, or prayer, did no more than the brutes, which cry out when they are pained. Therefore they received no answer from God, when suffering under the oppression of proud tyrants; for he would not regard the vain and rebellious complaints of ungodly men. And indeed Job's complaint, that the Lord would not hear his cry, (xix. 7.) originated from a similar cause: for though he might not be an ungodly man; yet he had not duly humbled himself under his afflictions, and therefore was disregarded. The original word rendered my Maker, (10.) is plural: and some think it indicates the plurality of persons in the unity of the Godhead.

V. 14—16. Job had frequently expressed himself as having no hope that the Lord would appear for his relief. But Elihu reminded him, that God set judgement before him, and always acted in wisdom, equity, and faithfulness: he would therefore certainly do him justice; and he would likewise show him mercy if he duly sought it: and he exhorted him to trust in him and wait his time. But as he had yielded to unbelief and impatience, the Lord had visited him in anger; and so long as he indulged the same rebellious spirit, he would not know him, or take any 13 Surely ^u God will not hear vanity, neither will the Almighty ^x regard it.

14 Although ^y thou sayest thou shalt not see him, ^z yet judgment is before him; therefore ^a trust thou in him.

15 But now, ^b because it is not so, ^c he hath ^e visited in his anger; yet [†] he knoweth it not ^d in great extremity:

16 Therefore doth Job ^e open his mouth in vain; he multiplieth words without knowledge.

favourable notice of him, in his greatest extremity. Therefore he hitherto had spoken to no purpose, but had multiplied inconsiderate and sinful words, in disputing with his friends, when he ought to have been humbling himself before God.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

It is very useful to appeal to men's reason and conscience, concerning their conduct in those things which have been evidently faulty: for many speak and do in haste, and when warmed in dispute, what they will not deliberately justify. Indeed the expressions of men when angry are often worse than their meaning: and though it be unfair to condemn them for inferences which they disallow; yet it is proper to show them how their words may produce bad consequences, that they may be humbled for their rashness, and speak more cautiously another time. The immensity of the works of God may lead us to some feeble apprehensions of his infinite Majesty: and the consideration of his undervived and unchangeable glory and felicity should convince us, that all his commandments, judgments, and dispensations, result from his essential perfections. He forbids and punishes that which is evil in itself and tends to misery: he commands and delights in what is good and tends to felicity, without any possible accession to his own infinite blessedness. This is the proper display of his own glory, and demands the tribute of our adoring praise. The Judge of all the earth cannot but do what is right, though we are often incapable of discerning the reasons of his conduct: but as we have all multiplied transgressions against him; and as he cannot receive any thing from us which he hath not first given unto us, we can have no cause to complain of hard measures when afflicted: and as our Judge is now, as a Saviour, on a mercy-seat, we can have no reason to conclude, that it would be in vain for us to repent, seek forgiveness, and cleanse ourselves from our iniquities: and when impatience, pride, and unbelief suggest such conclusions, we associate ourselves for the time with the workers of iniquity, and expose ourselves to just reproofs. Whilst a righteous man becomes a public blessing, in proportion to his station in society, the exalted oppressor multiplies iniquities and miseries: and though the oppressed, through their own criminality, may fail of finding redress, or though God may leave them for a time under this trial

CHAP. XXXVI.

Elihu requires attention, while with truth and knowledge he shows the justice of God in all his judgments, the designs of his chastisements, and the profit of making a right use of them, 1—15. He reproves, warns, and counsels Job, 16—21. He reminds him that the power of God is uncontrollable, and that his works and dispensations should be magnified, but cannot be comprehended, 22—33.

ELIHU also proceeded, and said, 2^a Suffer me a little, and I will shew thee that * I have yet to speak ^b on God's behalf.

3 I will ^c fetch my knowledge from afar, and will ^d ascribe, righteousness to my Maker.

6 He ^k preserveth not the life of the wicked ; but ^l giveth right to the ^m poor,

7 He ⁿ withdraweth not his eyes from the righteous : but ^o with kings are they on the throne ; yea, ^p he doth establish them for ever, and they are exalted.

8 And ^q if they be bound in fetters, and be holden in ^r cords of affliction ;

9 Then ^s he sheweth them their work, and ^t their transgressions that they have exceeded.

10 He ^u openeth also their ear to discipline, and ^v commandeth that they return from iniquity.

11 ^w If they obey and serve him, they shall ^x spend their days in prosperity, and their years in pleasures :

12 But ^y if they obey not, they shall ^z perish by the sword, and they shall ^{aa} die without knowledge.

13 But the hypocrites in heart ^{ab} heap up wrath : ^{ac} they cry not when he ^{ad} bindeth them.

for their good ; yet he will certainly at length punish the haughty oppressor. But how few of the afflicted, who groan under their miseries, inquire after God and trust in his name ! The most, even of the wretched, disregard their obligations and accountableness to him, and refuse to repent and humble themselves for their sins, and to seek forgiveness and comfort from him. But to humble believers he causes light to arise in the darkness, and he fills their mouths with songs of deliverance, in the midnight season of tribulation. God our Creator having formed us after his own likeness, hath made us vastly more capable of knowledge than the brute creation : but, alas ! sin has rendered us more stupid in many things than they : and, except we partake of renewing grace, we are prone to murmur under our sufferings, without inquiring after the cause, or the remedy. These howlings of distress are not acceptable to God : they are vain, selfish, and consistent with the grossest impiety and enmity ; and therefore we need not wonder, that impenitent sufferers are left, without succour, to endure the just punishment of their obstinate wickedness, even from the hands of oppressors more wicked than themselves. If pious persons are betrayed into any degree of a similar spirit, and delay to humble themselves under the afflicting hand of God, or to seek all their help and comfort from him ; they may expect their trials will be continued, till they are reduced to a better temper. In all these things " the LORD is a God of judgment, and by him actions are weighed." All his works are in wisdom and justice ; and he sheweth mercy to those who humbly trust in him. But when his corrections excite obstinacy, impatience, and unbelief, he will infuse more anger into the bitter cup ; he will withhold comfort, and appear to disregard the extremities to which even his people are reduced. Then their rebellious murmurs only add to their guilt and vexation, and they multiply words without knowledge in attempting to excuse themselves. Let not then any afflicted person, like Job, prolong his own misery by keeping at a distance from a throne of grace, standing in his own vindication, expecting help from other quarters, or despairing of help from God : but let us call upon him in our troubles, and he will hear us, and we shall praise him.

NOTES.

CHAP. XXXVI. V. 1—4. As Job still received Elihu's reproofs in humble silence, Elihu again demanded his attention : indeed he supposed that he was entitled to it, as he was speaking in the cause of God, and to vindicate his righteousness, which had been apparently denied. He had some arguments to adduce, which had not occurred to the other speakers, and which were brought from afar, or originally derived from divine revelation : he promised that he would admit of no flattery, calumny, or sophistry, into his discourse : and he was confident that his knowledge upon the subject was so clear and full, as to be worthy of their serious regard.

of divine providence; in which he spake more accurately than the other disputants, without aiming to decide upon Job's character. Yet he seems to have leaned to the sentiments of Job's friends, that, in some way or other, temporal deliverance and prosperity, or the contrary, generally distinguished betwixt the righteous and the wicked. He observed that God was mighty in strength and wisdom: yet, contrary to the common example of the wise and powerful in this world, he despised not the persons or the causes of the meanest of his subjects, he overlooked none, and oppressed none: and he noticed the most ignorant, poor, and contemptible of the earth, and would surely do them justice; yea, they all partook of his common benefits, and the vilest likewise, of his special mercies, when willing to seek for them. Elihu further stated, that wicked men were not under the peculiar protection which secured the righteous; and therefore their lives were more exposed, and generally terminated prematurely; and that this often took place by the judgment of God, in doing right to the poor whom they had injured. But assuredly He continually noticed and took care of his people: sometimes he advanced them to temporal authority; they were at all times watched over, with as much care as the greatest monarchs, whose lives were of vast importance to multitudes; and they would be sure at last to be established for ever in the most exalted and glorious state. If in this world they were imprisoned by oppressors, or any other way afflicted and distressed, it was intended for their benefit: the Lord would then show them whatever was sinful in their conduct: thus he would dispose them to receive instruction, and enforce their obligations to repent and turn from every sin, and follow after holiness. When they were brought more humbly and faithfully to submit, obey, and worship him, he would restore and increase their comforts and prosperity, and they would spend their lives in peace and pleasure. But if any continued obstinate and impenitent, they might expect to be cut off by some sudden judgment, and to perish in their sins. Thus hypocrites, who cloaked their secret crimes with a show of piety, treasured up wrath: because, when bound with the cords of affliction, they refused to humble themselves and cry for help unto God. They were therefore often cut off prematurely, or left to apostatize, and spend their lives amongst the most atrocious sinners, increasing their own condemnation: and at last they would be doomed to misery with the most abominable transgressors, such as were the unclean inhabitants of Sodom. But the poor in spirit, the humble and contrite, would certainly be delivered from their afflictions; and their oppressions would prove lessons of useful and durable instruction.

V. 16—21. Elihu next applied his doctrine to the case of Job. He was persuaded that God would before that time have delivered him out of trouble, and restored him to liberty, comfort, and plenty, if he had behaved properly under correction. But he had copied the language and sanctioned the rebellions of the wicked. It was not therefore necessary to determine what his former character had been: at present he certainly was suffering justly; and as the wrath of God was kindled against him, instead of persevering to provoke him by presumptuous murmurs, he ought to be very careful what he spake: for a single stroke of Omnipotence would take him away beyond the reach of any ransom: so that, if he had possessed all the riches and power in the world, it would not be accepted, or be availing, for the deliverance of his soul. He ought not therefore so earnestly to desire the night of death, that he might rest from his sufferings: for in his present rebellious state of mind it was likely to come in wrath, if at all; and he should remember, that men by it were cut off in that place or state in which they had lived and were found, and their sentence was then rendered irreversible. He ought therefore to take heed, that he allowed himself in no sin, and especially that he did not unjustly reflect upon God; for it had appeared from many of his expressions, that he actually chose iniquity rather than affliction. No doubt Elihu in this conclusion was far too severe on Job: for though he had impatiently and rashly wished for death, he had never insinuated that he preferred sin to suffering.

V. 22—33. Elihu here again renewed his attempt to convince Job of his presumption, by representing to him the incomprehensible majesty and power of God. It was madness to contend with him, who alone was able to deliver or exalt him; or to dedicate to him, who alone can teach man wisdom; and from whom Job should have sought instruction, how to behave under his afflictions and obtain deliverance from them. Who could pretend a right to enjoin to the Sovereign of the universe, the Fountain of life and excellence, how He ought to act? Or to find fault with any of his appointments? It was far more proper for men to remember their duty, and to magnify, admire, and praise the works of God, as presented to their view, than to pass a judgment upon those dispensations which are beyond their comprehension. The most distant view of the creation and of the course of nature, discovered his eternal power and Godhead, to those who would behold them: but the greatness of the infinite and eternal God could not be known, or searched out. Even the rain, which Elihu had before noticed, displayed exceedingly his wisdom and goodness: as he pleased, the clouds distilled their contents in gentler rains or heavier showers, for the abundant benefit of man. But none could fully comprehend how the clouds were formed and spread abroad, or the thunders produced in those pavilions of the Almighty. For whilst a glorious light was at one moment diffused over the clouds, at the next that light was veiled by the water, drawn even from the bottom of the sea: or the thick clouds seemed to darken the sea even to the bottom. Thus by dreadful thunder-storms, inundations, or deluges, the Lord sometimes executed his judgments upon sinners, and at others he made the earth yield in abundance food for man and beast. The same clouds, which just before were a blaze of light, immediately after obscure the light of the sun and darken the air. The distant noise portended the approaching tempest: and the cattle had an instinctive dread of it, whilst the vapours were ascending or condensing in the atmosphere. It seems evident that a terrible storm, actually approaching, suggested these thoughts to Elihu.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—15.

When wise and pious men speak in God's behalf, and show his righteousness in all his precepts, judgments, and appointments, they are entitled to our strictest and most patient attention. But they who attempt this service, should watch their own hearts, and beware of insincerity and corrupt motives: for many professed teachers of divine truth are evidently consulting their own interest and reputation, and not seeking to glorify God and edify their brethren. They should likewise carefully weigh their principles, and seek wisdom from Him who alone is, strictly speaking, "perfect in knowledge;" that their instructions may be scriptural, convincing, and edifying; that none may be able to object to them; and that they may not fairly admit of a bad construction. In the glorious character of our God, almighty power, infinite wisdom and knowledge, harmonize with the most perfect justice, and the most condescending goodness and mercy: and whilst his providential kindness reacheth to the most rebellious of his enemies on earth; he receiveth to his special favour the meanest and vilest who trust in his mercy, and seek to return to him and his service. May we enjoy his love and copy his example! and not despise the poor and weak, or treat with undue severity or disdain the most atrocious criminals. The wicked however have no security for the preservation of their lives and comforts: they are interested in no promises, but lie under dreadful threatenings, and are liable every moment to be cut off in their sins; though spared from day to day, that they may have space for repentance, or if they neglect it, to fill up the measure of their iniquities. But God watches over the righteous continually; no evil can befall them: they are more honourable in his sight than the greatest princes; and they shall all of them be exalted and established as kings and priests before him for ever. In this world they have many tribulations, in order to humble, and prove them, and do them good at last. For they are thus brought acquainted with the evil of their own hearts, and all their deviations from the holy law of God; and disposed to receive instruction, and to return from iniquity: being forgiven and accepted, their graces are increased, and their evil tempers subdued: and in proportion as they obey and serve the Lord in simplicity and diligence, their souls at least prosper, and divine consolations cause them to spend their years in pleasure; except as they are sometimes suspended for their greater good. But when they disobey and turn aside, they mar their own comfort: and whilst they continue unhumiliated under rebukes and chastenings, they prolong their own sufferings, and bring their characters into doubt, both with themselves and others. The impiety even of the wicked is greatly aggravated by their obstinacy under afflictions and terrors. Many of them thus provoke God to cut them off: and in this way hypocrites especially fill up the measure of their iniquities; for it is undeniable that judgments and mercies make less impression upon them than upon the openly profane. And whether sinners die in youth, or live long to heap up wrath, their case is dreadful, and their eternal portion must be among the abominable and unclean.

V. 16—33.

It is lamentable that men professing godliness should ever so yield to murmurs and despondency, as to seem to favour the cause and justify the objections of the wicked. Surely they ought to be plainly rebuked, and even warned not to deceive themselves, but to fear lest that wrath come upon them which awaits the workers of iniquity: for how can it be determined that they are the servants of God, who are imitating the conduct of his enemies? It is therefore proper to remind any one, who murmurs against the Lord's appointments, of the power of his wrath, the strictness of his justice, and the unchangeableness of his judgments. If he cut off the sinner by the stroke of his wrath, all the treasures and all the power on earth will be utterly unavailing. Nay, the great ransom of the Saviour's blood will not profit the finally impenitent and unbelieving. The ransom indeed is of infinite sufficiency: but if rejected till the night of death cometh, the door of mercy is then shut, and hope expires for ever. Yet men often desire, and even rush upon death, to get rid of present uneasiness, whilst perfect strangers to this great atonement; as if in haste to be for ever removed from the sound and hope of salvation! And believers seldom vehemently wish for death, when the evidences of their acceptance are most bright, or their graces in most lively exercise. All then should remember, that men at their death are cut off in their place, and their condition becomes eternally irreversible. Instead therefore of shrinking from adversity, we should seek deliverance from the love and power of sin; and prefer the greatest suffering to the least iniquity. Yet, alas! most men choose iniquity rather than affliction; 'They ease their cares by sinful pleasures, they increase their wealth by sinful pursuits, escape their troubles by sinful projects, and evade sufferings by sinful compliances.' (Henry.) But this is a miserable choice, of which they will at length bitterly repent: for the favour of God alone can exalt or make us happy. He alone can teach us to behave wisely and live comfortably in every situation: he needs no counsellor, and allows of no accuser; but justly requires all to admire the discoveries of his glory which they can understand; to adore the depths they cannot comprehend; and to stand in awe of his unsearchable wisdom, power, and authority. Every appearance in nature at once displays and conceals, his infinite glories; much remains incomprehensible; but enough is seen to call forth our gratitude, animate our praises, or excite our consternation. The clouds and rain with the thunders and lightnings declare his goodness, and proclaim the power of his wrath. Each object bears a double aspect: and whilst the worker of iniquity ought to tremble; the true believer should rejoice. "It is the glorious God that maketh the thunder," as well as that fertilizes the earth: and the children should hear with pleasure their Father's voice, even when nature seems convulsed, and he speaks in terror to his enemies.

heart was moved out of its place. He therefore called on Job and all the company to hearken with attention and awe to the thunder, as the majestic voice of God. Whatever account might be given of the second causes that produced these tremendous effects, the great First Cause must be acknowledged in them, who thus alarmed the minds of careless sinners. The giving of the law was attended by tremendous thunderings and lightnings; and so was the Lord's speaking to Job out of the whirlwind. By the divine mandate, the flashes of lightning darted from one part of the sky to the other; along with the crashing roar of the thunder, which not reaching the ear so soon as the lightning did the eye, seemed to follow it. This voice of God surpassed all other sounds in majesty and solemnity: nor could any one stay or prevent the effects of it when he pleased thus to speak in terror. In this he wrought marvellously, and all his works were great and incomprehensible. Whether he commanded the snow, the gentler rains, or more impetuous showers sweeping all before them, he acted in a manner which man could not explain. By tempestuous weather he put a stop to the works of men, as if their hands were sealed up: and this gave them leisure to consider his works; whilst the beasts retired and lay inactive in their dens. When the wind blew from the south, terrible whirlwinds were excited; and when it shifted to the north, cold weather ensued: but who could understand the manner in which these changes were wrought? Indeed the wind might be called the breath of God; and by it, when he pleased, the inexplicable frost was produced, and the rivers were contracted, or formed into a solid substance. The thick clouds were wearied and worn out, by watering the earth: and often, by the shining of the sun on them, they appeared bright, and the beauteous rainbow was formed. But all these, and all the bright clouds, which contained no rain, were turned about by the counsels of God, and executed his commands; whether by drought or excess of rain he corrected a guilty nation, or by moderate rain he showed mercy to a favoured land.

V. 14—22. Elihu next called upon Job to consider and explain all these wonderful appearances; and if he could not, to confess his presumption, in arraigning the more mysterious dispensations of the divine government. Did he know when God made all these arrangements? Or could he understand how light and fire were produced from the watery cloud? or the splendid rainbow from the dark cloud? Could he explain in what manner the clouds were balanced to move about, continue in the air, or descend in showers; or how the air grew warm, and his garments too heating, when the gentle south wind blew? Had he assisted in spreading the expanse of heaven, which was immoveably strong, and in which, as in a mirror, the reflection of the divine glory might be perceived?—(Mirrors were in those days formed of brass, cast into a proper form and highly polished.) If Job could explain these matters, and teach those present how to speak of God, it would be very acceptable: for they were conscious that they could not order their discourses on such subjects with clearness or certainty; because of their own ignorance, and the darkness which rested upon the manner in which the works of God were performed. Indeed Elihu must acknowledge, that all he had spoken was beneath the subject, and unworthy of the Lord's acceptance, or of being mentioned to him at all: for he found his thoughts and powers swallowed up, and lost in this bottomless abyss. Whilst he was speaking, he observed that the wind had scattered the clouds, and the lightnings were ceased, and that the north wind had brought on fair weather, bright and resplendent as gold; (for that is the meaning of the original word.) In these and all the works of God his glorious and terrible majesty were displayed. How presumptuous then must it be to contend with him; when his ordinary works were too dazzling for man to look upon!

V. 23, 24. It is evident that towards the close of his discourse, Elihu spake as one in great confusion. Some conjecture, that what is rendered Fair weather cometh out of the north, referred to some glorious appearance in the north, which intimated the Lord's immediate presence, as about to speak. Elihu therefore hastened to conclude; briefly declaring, that the Almighty God was unsearchable and incomprehensible; that he infinitely excelled all creatures,

CHAP. XXXVIII.

The Lord, out of the whirlwind, challenges Job to answer him, 1—3. By enumerating his mighty works in creation in power, justice, and judgment: that he would oppress none, nor afflict his people without cause. Men ought therefore to stand in awe of him, and fear to offend him, or to murmur against his appointments: for he disregarded all the supposed wisdom of those who deemed themselves authorized or qualified, to scrutinize and find fault with his conduct. Elihu evidently thought, that Job had been thus irreverent and presumptuous: and when the Lord himself spake, he brought exactly the same charge against him.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—13.

The attentive mind will perceive affecting displays of the power, wisdom, goodness, and majesty of God, in the operations of nature: and the terrors excited by some of them should remind us of that tremendous scene which will usher in “the day of judgment, and perdition of un-“godly men.” If the thunder-storm caused the heart of pious Elihu to tremble and start; if Moses was exceedingly alarmed before mount Sinai; if even faith, and love to God cannot utterly preserve men from dismay in these inferior circumstances of terror: what will be the horror and despair of the wicked at that tremendous season? Oh that men would attentively hearken to the voice of God, who in various ways “warns them to flee from the wrath “to come;” and from his mercy-seat, with a voice of less terror, but of more glorious excellency, invites them to accept of his salvation and be happy!—All irrational creatures obey the voice and subserve the will of the great Creator: surely then we, whom he hath endued with reason, should be shamed into obedience and submission! We behold the marvellous works of God, and partake of his bounty, in the revolution of the seasons and the change of the weather: for heat and cold, rain and snow, or dry weather, have their several beneficial effects. But who can fully comprehend the whole mechanism of Nature, or rather these operations of God? How incompetent then must we be to explain the mysteries of his incomprehensible and eternal existence, of his decrees, or of his universal government! But as they who know nothing of natural philosophy, receive the full benefit of the revolving seasons, whilst they who are most informed cannot evade the inclemency of the weather, or prevent storms, or secure themselves against their effects: so the simplest believer may receive the benefit and comfort of divine mysteries and of the Lord’s protection; whilst the proudest and most learned objector cannot annul his counsels, alter his dispensations, or escape his vengeance. Our wisdom then consists in accommodating ourselves to the situation allotted us, and in deriving benefit, as we can, from those appointments which we cannot alter: in accepting of proffered mercy in the Lord’s way; in submitting to his correction and his righteousness; and in leaving all difficulties to another world. When Providence takes us off from secular employments, we should occupy ourselves more entirely in meditating on the works of God, in the study of his word, and in the exercises of devotion: else in what do we surpass the beasts, who retire and remain in their dens?—The weather is altogether of God’s appointment: it is generally ordered in mercy as well as in wisdom, for the common good; and if at any time it be really afflictive, it is sent for correction, and to call us to repentance and prayer. But the ill opinion which men entertain of the divine management, is evident in their incessant murmurs in this particular: though the result of the whole system, through the year, generally demonstrates the folly and ingratitude, as well as the rebellion, of their complaints. Believers should carefully avoid such peevishness: there are no bad days as the Lord makes them; but we make ourselves many by our sins.

V. 14—24.

In all our discourses of the works of God, we either are conscious of our own ignorance, or we soon expose it. “We cannot order our speech by reason of darkness,” or teach one another satisfactorily in these sublime subjects: we may well be ashamed of our best attempts to magnify the glorious excellencies and works of God: indeed, we have nothing to boast of on any account; but must still confess, not only that we are unprofitable servants, but that we are wretched sinners. In short, “with God “is terrible majesty:” we cannot search him out or comprehend his designs: but if our meditations lead us to more admiring adoring views of his greatness, holiness, justice, wisdom, and goodness; if they terminate in a deeper sense of our own ignorance, vileness, and sinfulness; if they warn us to reverence and submit to him, and to cease from our own wisdom; the effect will be honourable to him, useful to us, and edifying to our brethren. And whatever scenes we witness, whatever changes we experience; we may stay our minds on him, who will give strength to his people, and bless them with his unspeakable peace.

NOTES.

CHAP. XXXVIII. V. 1. Both Job and his opponents had appealed to the Lord, and earnestly desired that he would decide the controversy. Job had silenced, but he had not convinced his friends: Elihu had silenced Job, but had not brought him to plead guilty; and his character was yet undecided. The debate would therefore have terminated inconclusively, had it not pleased God to interpose: but he soon made Job sensible of his faults; and he convinced his friends that he was a righteous man, and that they had done him injustice; and thus all parties were humbled and profited by the transaction. With terrible majesty the Lord spake out of the cloud, which was attended with a vehement whirlwind whilst he was speaking. He addressed Job, and continued Elihu's argument; 'but in imitable words, excelling his and all other men's, in the loftiness of the style, as much as a thunder doth a whisper.' (Bp. Patrick.) He rebuked Job first, and then his friends: but Elihu, who had come nearest to the truth, and had spoken with reverence, seriousness, and temper, was not reprov'd, though in some things he bore too hard upon Job. In attempting to comment upon these words of the Almighty, we may well say, with Elihu, "If a man speak, surely he shall be swallowed up." The very attempt might create a tremor, lest it should be reprov'd, "as darkening counsel by words without knowledge:" and as the whole discourse was intended as a reproof of the want of reverence and modesty, which an eminently wise and pious man had fallen into, it stands as a beacon, cautioning the expositor to keep at a distance from the same perilous rock. But, if giving the supposed meaning, in language more intelligible to the plain modern reader, though immensely less suited to the sublime subject, may assist in understanding the passage, the attempt will meet with a pardon from a merciful God, and perhaps a candid perusal from man.

V. 2. As Elihu had spoken last, it might have been thought that he was addressed: but Job knew that he was especially intended, and this first word seems to have brought him to a more becoming temper. He had discoursed upon the counsels of God and the methods of Providence; but he had expressed himself rashly and irreverently, as if God had afflicted him without cause, and with rigour and cruelty: thus he had rendered the subject more obscure, and the auditors more perplexed, than before, and had only manifested his own ignorance. "But who was he, that thus darkened counsel by words without knowledge?" Did an ignorant sinful man presume to speak such language concerning the infinite God! Did Job, the servant of the Lord, go thus in company with his enemies! JEHOVAH would not, in such a cause, deign to vindicate his wisdom, justice, goodness, or truth, against so presumptuous an accusation: but he would make the accuser feel his own ignorance and impotence, and shame him out of his indecent and unreasonable murmurs: he would teach him to contend with his equals, the potsherds of the earth; and not cite God to his bar, as if he were his compeer or his judge. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 3. Gird up, &c. Job had spoken of ordering his cause before God, of demanding of him, and being answered, and of coming as a prince before him: and he had grievously complained that he could not get a hearing. But now the time of trial was come; and the Lord summoned him to collect all his courage and resolution; and without delay to prepare his answers to some previous questions, that he had to propose unto him.

V. 4—7. These abrupt questions, which could only be answered in the negative, were suited to impress Job with a conviction of the infinite knowledge, wisdom, and power of the eternal God, and of his own extreme ignorance, and incompetency to form a judgment of his appointments. Was he present, counselling or assisting, when the earth was created? Did he appoint the dimensions and proportions of that immense structure? Could he understand whence its stability arose, or how it was fixed as a building upon a firm foundation?—At that period, the first and brightest productions of creative power, the stars in the firmament, or rather the holy angels, the morning stars of the creation, the sons of God, witnessed, adored, and rejoiced with exultation. And would Job, who had then no existence, find fault with the work which they admired? Would he presume to direct the government of what he had no hand in forming? Or would he suppose the dispensations of Providence less perfect than the work of creation? But if this exceeded his comprehension, would he dare to decide on other still more mysterious works of God?

V. 8—11. Job was next called to consider the mighty ocean. At the Creator's word, the seas separated from the dry land, issuing forth as an infant from the womb. The clouds that hover over the ocean, and the unknown shores which surround it, form, as it were, the swaddling band and garment of it, 'as if it were but as a little babe in the hands of God.' The vast hollows of the earth are its appointed place in which it is confined, as with bolts and bars: and though it is vehemently tossed by tempestuous winds, and the tides roll its billows to the shore, as if it were about to cover the earth again; yet, at the Lord's command, the storm subsides, and the tide rolls back; and contents? Had he visited all the deep and dark caverns of the earth? Or was he fully acquainted with the nature and consequences of death, and with what takes place in the invisible world? Nay, had he traversed the whole of the earth; so as to be able to show its dimensions, and describe all the lands, climates, and creatures, which it contains?

V. 19—21. Could Job fully explain the nature, and declare the origin, of light or darkness? What they are, and whence they come? Could he trace the streams of them back to the fountain, so as to visit their residence, and bring them forth to accomplish his own purposes? Or show whither the light retired during the night; and the abode of darkness after the approach of the sun? Was he born before the present order was established? and had long observation acquainted him with these matters, which to all else were incomprehensible?—Though modern experiments have enabled men to form some theories concerning light and colours; yet how very little do we yet know about them, or what they are, and how they are!

V. 22—30. To convince Job of his ignorance, and of the unsearchable wisdom and knowledge of God, some other perplexing questions were proposed to him. The snow and hail seem to be brought forth out of a treasury. But had Job ever entered thither? Did he understand the manner of their production? or were they at his command? With them the Lord troubles and fights against his enemies, when he sees good: but could Job employ them in his own cause, after the same manner? Could he explain the way in he deals with this most furious element as easily as with an infant: and this, not so much by the barrier of the shores, as by virtue of that inexplicable property which we call gravitation. Thus he stays the proud waves of the sea, and assigns them their bounds which they cannot pass. But had Job any hand in contriving or effecting this? Or could he comprehend how it was done?

V. 12—15. It was evident that the things hitherto mentioned had existed before Job was born: by which he might be led to reflect upon the eternity of God, and contrast it with the few days of his life. But had he, during that short time, given orders for the succession of night and day? At the appointed hour the morning is ushered in, and the light gradually overspreads the horizon, and drives away the wicked from their deeds of darkness. Immediately the earth assumes a new form, as the wax from under the seal, and appears in fresh beauty as arrayed in splendid garments. Thus the wicked are disappointed of their expected success, and are detected and repressed. But did Job command this beneficial and welcome change? Did it depend on his care and management? Nay, could he explain in what manner the sun, at such an immense distance, enlightened the earth? Or could he supply the want, should his beams be withheld; or command them to come when he pleased?

V. 16—18. The vast ocean covereth immense treasures and wonderful productions of the Creator. But had Job surveyed these repositories, or taken an inventory of their

which the morning light from the east is divided and scattered over the whole earth? Could he suppose that any but God directed the clouds, as a water-course, to convey the waters above the firmament to their appointed places, attended by thunder and lightning, so that even the uncultivated parts of the earth were watered, and made to produce food for the beasts which inhabit them? Could any account be given of the formation of the rain into larger or smaller drops? Was any one instrumental in the production of the dew, the ice, or the hoar-frost? Were not all these entirely the work of God, and inexplicable to man? Thus the course of rivers was arrested, the fluidity of the water changed, and even the ocean covered as with a pavement of stone. These are most stupendous displays of the divine power, and only unnoticed because so common.

V. 31—41. The different seasons of the year are marked out by the relative situation of the fixed stars to the earth and to the sun. But could Job prevent the effects of those constellations, which seemed to preside either over the genial spring, or the dreary winter? Could he even explain how these effects were produced? If he felt his ignorance and weakness in this matter, let him learn to keep his proper place, and to leave the government of the world to its Creator. Could he in a dry season command the clouds to water the earth from their abundance? Would they or the lightnings obey his orders, and execute his purpose? Was he the author even of his own scanty measure of wisdom and knowledge? Could he explain what thought was? Could he keep a register of the clouds and their contents, and of the commerce which they carried on? Could he seal up those "bottles of heaven," and prevent more rain from falling; when the dust is melted into a mass, and the clods are joined together? Would he undertake to provide food for the lions? Was not even this far beyond his power? Nay, he could not provide for the young ravens; when deserted or expelled from the nest, they by their natural call seem to cry unto God for food. In short, whatever Job considered, above or beneath, within or around him, he must perceive the infinite wisdom, knowledge, power, and goodness of God; and feel his own incapacity to discourse on such subjects as he had presumptuously ventured on.

The condescension of the God of glory, in making himself known to sinful man for his humiliation, instead of executing vengeance upon him for his rebellion, demands our highest admiration and our warmest gratitude: and the most tremendous method, by which he abases a sinner in the dust, should be acknowledged as the effect of his mercy; for it tends to comfort and joy. When the wisest of men presume to intrude into those "secret things which belong to God," and to be wise above what is written, they are sure to "darken counsel by words without knowledge," and perhaps undesignedly to serve the cause of impiety or skepticism: so that numbers who have been vain of their acute, learned, and accurate reasonings upon mysterious subjects; and who have been admired for their sagacity and judgment, will meet with such a rebuke from the Lord as Job did, or rather one far more severe. We should then be very careful, in all our investigations, not to exceed our assigned limits, or to go out of our depth; or to leave the friendly shore of the word of God, to launch into the immense ocean of infinities. Conscious of our ignorance, guilt, and weakness, it becomes us to speak with trembling humility and reverence, when the perfections, decrees, or operations of God are our subject: for "such knowledge is too high for us, we cannot attain unto it." But indeed we are none of us suitably impressed with awe of the infinite majesty of God: our appeals to him generally savour of presumption; and we should not be able to answer before him, as we are apt rashly to think we could. Though he sometimes deigns to reason with his creatures, and to demonstrate his equity in his dealings with them: yet he more generally silences the arrogant objector, by a display of his infinite power, authority, and majesty: as more becoming the Sovereign of the world. Indeed all nature proclaims his glory: no creature fully comprehends his works; but contemplation of them, with adoring and exulting triumphant praises, forms the delight of each intelligent being, in exact proportion to the extent of his powers, and the degree of his holiness.

KNOWEST thou the time when^a the wild goats of the rock bring forth?

Thus when the creation was finished, and appeared in all its beauty, "The morning-stars sang together, and all the sons of God shouted for joy." Yet they discover still brighter glories in the mysteries of redeeming love: into which especially "they desire to look" with ceaseless admiration: and in proportion as the new-creating Spirit renders us like to them in knowledge and holiness; we shall become capable of participating their exalted joys, and find pleasures of which we now have scarcely a conception. But in other things the boasted knowledge of mankind is in fact a very small matter: the best informed must perceive their own ignorance in every thing: none can fully understand the most common phenomena of nature: and after all the discoveries of modern times, most of them remain in some respects as inexplicable as ever. Indeed we are of yesterday; our days are passing away as a shadow: and a humble willingness to be taught of God, and to credit his sure testimony, as contained in the sacred oracles; with a diligent attention to our proper interest and duty, as fallen creatures under a dispensation of mercy, are infinitely preferable to all the learning of the schools. Not that learning should be depreciated; provided it be accompanied with humility, kept in its proper place, directed to its proper objects, and not allowed to interfere within the province of revelation and faith. Yet even in natural things man's scanty measure of knowledge avails him but little; for he still finds himself unable to effect those alterations, which might give him ease or conduce to his comfort. But whatever the Lord doeth must be right: because he is infinite in wisdom, justice, truth, and goodness. As the world was created, so it is governed, by him, exactly as it should be. The contemplation of his wise and surprising contrivance, in the economy of nature, should silence all our objections to his providential dispensations, and teach us to desire that he would choose and manage all for us as he pleases. His power, which formed and bounds the mighty ocean, and which is displayed wherever we turn our eyes, should remind the sinner of the power of his wrath; convince him how vain it will be to oppose his authority; and warn him without delay to seek pardon and reconciliation: and it should teach the believer to rejoice in his Friend and Protector; who can say to the proudest persecutors, or to the hosts of hell, "Hitherto shall ye come, and no further, and here shall your proud rage be stayed."

V. 12—41.

be numerous, when we can discern none. The revolutions of day and night, and of the seasons of the year, with all that profusion of bounty with which they are crowned, and of which his enemies richly partake, should encourage us to expect large blessings from his covenant-love in Jesus Christ, and to be followers of him in love to our enemies. And as he feeds the lions, and the ravens that cry unto him; let us learn to ask and expect our daily bread from him. The constancy and exactness, with which natural effects are produced, should remind us of the faithfulness of the Lord's promises, and the immutability of his counsel; and excite us to be constant and exact in our course of daily worship and obedience. The consideration of his all-sufficiency and eternity should teach us to choose his favour as our portion and blessedness for ever: and every view that we take of his manifested perfections, is suited to convince us of his right to our love and obedience, of the evil of sinning against him, and of our need of his mercy and salvation. The humiliating recollection of our comparative insignificance should check our pride and presumption, and lay us low in reverential fear and self abasement. It would be in vain for us to command the clouds to rain, or to attempt to stay these bottles of heaven: but if we call upon the Lord in our necessities or fears, he will regulate all these things for our good. In fine, the more we contemplate, the more we are confounded with the vastness and the variety of these discoveries of our God. All his ways are in wisdom; and every thing will concur to ruin his obstinate enemies: but all things work together for good to them that love him.

NOTES.

CHAP. XXXIX. V. 1—4. In this chapter some animals are selected, the nature or situation of which is peculiarly illustrative of the power, wisdom, and manifold works of God: and the questions proposed concerning them, were suited to convince Job how little he knew, or could do. The several species of the wild goats and hinds are continued from age to age: but not by the care of man. He does not know how long they go with young, or at what time they will bring forth: nor if he did, could he in any way tend on or assist them, as he can the domestic animals. Though they bring forth their young with much difficulty and pain, yet they need no human help: they soon forget their sorrows; and their young, being active and vigorous, are in a short time able to shift for themselves, as if they fed upon corn, or even by entering into the corn-fields, notwithstanding the precautions of the owner.

5 ¶ Who hath sent out ^d the wild ass free? or ^e who hath loosed the bands of the wild ass?

6 Whose house I have made the wilderness, and the ^{*} barren land his dwellings.

14 Which leaveth her eggs in the earth, and warmeth them in the dust;

15 And forgetteth that the foot may crush them, or that the wild beast may break them.

V. 5—8. Some animals are evidently created for labour, others scorn the yoke: the tame ass is formed for a patient drudge; but the wild ass cannot be subjected. He has liberty as it were by charter: the barren wilderness is his residence, and its scanty productions his subsistence: yet it would be vain to attempt enticing him into populous cities, for the sake of a more plentiful support; or rendering him obedient to a driver's voice. But who gave him this liberty? Did not the Lord? And would Job suppose that he had not wise reasons for so doing? And as no human power can alter the nature of this animal, or render him serviceable to man: so it is equally impossible to alter the appointments of God, whether we are satisfied with them or not.

V. 9—12. The rhinoceros, (which is supposed to be here intended,) is possessed of immense strength; and might perform proportionable labour, if he could be made to bear the yoke as the passive ox does. Yet Job was not so absurd as to expect this from him; nor would he depend on his assistance to plow his land, or gather in his harvest; knowing that it would be vain and dangerous to meddle with so powerful and fierce a creature. But was it not more perilous to quarrel with the allotments of the Almighty?

V. 13—18. The Creator hath divided his gifts among his creatures as he saw good; and in this, and in every other thing, his will and wisdom should be implicitly submitted to. To the peacock he hath given most beautiful plumage: but it is not remarkable for any thing else. The ostrich hath wings and feathers as a bird; but it is vastly larger than other birds, and is unable to mount aloft on its wings. It is likewise remarkable for its stupid insensibility in various respects. The female bird prepares no nest for her eggs, but lays them upon the earth, to be warmed by the heat of the sun, and that of the sand or dust, without any further attention. She has no instinctive remembrance that they are liable to be trodden upon and destroyed by man or beast; she is as regardless of her eggs and young, as if they did not belong to her; and is destitute of fear or care about them. For God hath not imparted to her that instinctive wisdom, which he hath to other creatures in this particular. But when she is alarmed for her own safety, she uses her wings to assist her in running, and in this manner exceeds in swiftness the fleetest animals, and when pursued by those who thus attempt to take her she seems to despise both the horse and his rider.

V. 19—25. This description of the horse hath been universally admired as inimitably sublime. It especially relates to those horses which are used in war; and in which the eastern countries have always excelled. God alone hath given the war-horse his strength and courage; the flowing mane, which clothes his neck, adds to the fierceness of his appearance, and seems to indicate his triumph. When going to the battle, he cannot be made afraid, or driven back, like the puny locust: the snorting of his nostrils, by which he bids defiance to his enemies, is dreadful. He paweth with his feet, as if he would tear up the earth in his impatience to engage: he glorieth and exulteth in his strength, and in going out to meet the armed men, in his eagerness to start, and his fierceness and rage for the fight, he as it were devoureth the intervening space. He can scarcely wait for the signal for the battle, or stand still, because of his impatience; and he deems the dreadful alarm of the trumpet a joyful sound: he has an instinctive sense of the battle, at a distance; and is all on fire to rush amongst the captains, who with most terrific shouts are marching to the assault. Yet is this fierce and intrepid animal easily subjected to man, made to fear the touch of the whip or spur, obey the motion of the bridle, or even the voice of the rider, and almost that of a child. So wonderfully hath God formed and fitted him for the service of man!

V. 26—30. The hawk is remarkable for the force with which it flies, and the skill with which it takes its prey: but did Job communicate those properties by his wisdom? The species of hawk here meant is supposed to have removed southward at stated periods, for the sake of a warmer climate. In like manner the eagle, which is remarkable for soaring higher than any other bird, and for building her nest in the most inaccessible situations, utterly disregards man's command. From her towering heights she seeks her prey; and by her most piercing sight sees it at a vast distance, and darts down upon it in a moment. Thus her young are trained up to suck the blood of the prey; and she resorts where the dead bodies of man or beast abound.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The infinite power, wisdom, and goodness of God, are legible in all the variety of his creatures: "He openeth his hand and satisfieth the desire of every living thing," and he watches over them all with constant attention. Such as have no help from man, are taken care of as well as those that have: and in like manner his people will surely be provided for and protected, either by, or without, the instrumentality of their fellow-creatures. Every species of animals reminds us of our ignorance and impotence: they continue as God hath created them, and we can neither understand whence their different propensities arise, nor yet alter them; we often can derive no benefit from them; nay, they seem a nuisance to us, nor can we know for what purpose they were created. Yet we should acknowledge the wisdom of God and submit to his will:

we ought to be thankful for the benefit derived from some, and to be patient under the inconveniences occasioned by others: and we may learn from them to confide in his kind providence, and to aim to answer the end of our creation. Liberty is most valuable; yet the savage licentious freedom of the half-starved wild ass is not enviable. It is more desirable to be subject to wholesome laws, to labour, to be useful, and to live in plenty, than to set authority at defiance, and to live an indolent, unserviceable, and penurious life. In like manner, strength and power are only valuable when well employed; and the patient ox is far preferable to the untameable rhinoceros: for one talent improved is far better than many misemployed. It is very absurd for rational creatures to be vain of personal beauty, strength, courage, agility, or external decorations; when they are eclipsed in them all by the various species of brutes. God hath better endowments to confer on those whom he loves: and if he do not impart wisdom and grace, all the rest will prove a snare and a curse. It is lamentable to observe, that many human creatures are more stupid and hardened against their young, than the very ostrich, the disgrace of the animal tribes. They willingly forget their wants, dangers, and interests; they take no care of their welfare, either in this world or in the next, any more than if they did not belong to them: and thus their unavoidable labour and pain become vain, and to bad purpose, for want of subsequent attention, and fear about them; and by reason of the bad examples they set, and the pernicious instructions they give them. But we may cease to wonder at this, when we consider how stupidly insensible most men are to the interests of their own souls, which they neglect more fatally than the ostrich doth her young. By their contemptuous defiance or forgetfulness of God; or their vain attempts to hide or excuse their sins, they plainly show that he hath judicially deprived them of understanding. Indeed man by nature is prone to imitate the animals in their worst qualities. Like the wild ass he scorns the yoke of God, and like a wild bull in a net he rages against his corrections. Even his courage is generally unreasonable, instinctive, and furious, like that of a horse. His feet are swift to shed blood, or to venture his own life, when ambition, avarice, or revenge inspire him. In this case he mocketh at fear in his fierceness and rage; and not only rushes upon the weapons of death, but upon the divine vengeance without hesitation. Yet would he be afraid as the grasshopper, if called to prefer his plain duty towards God, his family, and society, to the caprice of fashion and the diabolical honour of revenge, in the midst of the ridicule and reproach of ungodly men! How would he then act, if called to venture, or lay down his life in the despised cause of truth and righteousness? Moreover, men naturally glory in their own strength and prowess, and rejoice in ostentatiously displaying them; and are more disposed to seek renown by rendering themselves terrible, than by becoming useful. The qualities of the horse, when united with his docility and promptitude to labour, are admirable; but when found in a rational creature, and separated from more useful dispositions, they become dreadful and detestable. Even the eagles, which teach their young to suck up the blood, do not prey upon their own species: they leave that cruelty to man. Yet from each of these animals we might learn useful lessons: they almost all instruct us to attend to our own safety, and that of our offspring; and to secure ourselves in some effectual refuge from the dangers to which we are exposed. But God forbid that we should be like the eagle only in soaring aloft and in keenness of sight, while we still look down to the earth for our prey, by ambition and worldly sagacity: or by using our religious knowledge, and our credit among Christians, only to cloak ambition, covetousness, and worldly lusts! But, reverencing the divine Majesty, and abasing ourselves before him in deep repentance, may we by faith and love mount upwards as on eagles' wings, till we obtain those things which are above, where Jesus sitteth on the right hand of God!

NOTES.

CHAP. XL. V. 1, 2. It is probable, the voice from the whirlwind ceased for a short space, that Job might speak, if he could make any reply: but as he continued silent, God answered his very thoughts, and in few words showed him what he intended by his multiplied questions. Job had complained of the Lord's dispensations, as if he meant to contend with him: but could Job give him any instructions how to govern the world? Did he think it wise to contend with omnipotence? or, having arraigned the dispensations of his Maker, would he also presume to vindicate his conduct, and to answer what had been spoken?

V. 3—5. At length Job ventured to speak; but not with that confidence which he had previously thought of. His friends had attempted to prove too much, and had only emboldened him in self-vindication: Elihu had reproved him with sharpness, and he had submitted to it. But the voice of God, and the declaration of his glorious perfections, effectually convinced him of his rashness and irreverence, in speaking of God, as he would have spoken of his equal. In this comparison, he perceived and acknowledged, that he was vile, a poor, mean, foolish, sinful creature, who ought not to have uttered one word reflecting upon the divine conduct. He was astonished at his own presumption, and could find nothing to plead in excuse: he would therefore be silent, in submission to the will and righteousness of God; having already spoken too often, and in a very unbecoming manner.

V. 6—8. In order that Job might be still more deeply humbled; the Lord again addressed him in the same majestic and awful manner as before, requiring his attention and his answer: and he more expressly reproved him for insisting upon his own righteousness, in such a manner as to seem to his friends, and even to Elihu, to charge God himself with injustice. Did he then require that the divine decrees respecting him should be reversed because they had been too severe? Or, that the Lord should be deemed unjust in his judgments, rather than that himself should be suspected of hypocrisy? Indeed wicked men often murmured against Providence in this blasphemous manner: but would Job copy their example, and charge God foolishly? Would he allow his tongue such liberty while vindicating himself from unjust accusations, or complaining of his sufferings, and the wrongs which were done him? Yet this had been the tendency of many expressions, which he had used in the heat of dispute and the bitterness of his soul.

V. 9—14. The Lord would not at all deign to argue the question of right with his servant: but insisted on that being taken for granted. “Shall not the judge of all the earth do right?” He purposed therefore to induce Job’s unreserved submission, by making him sensible, that he was acting most absurdly and presumptuously in attempting to decide on the conduct of the infinitely glorious God! Let him then consider whom he was offending: let him compare his puny arm with omnipotence, or his feeble voice with the tremendous thunder; and then let him inquire, whether he was able to make his cause good against such an adversary? But ere he ventured any further, let him make trial of his strength against the more potent of his fellow-men. Let him collect all his forces, assume all royal authority and majesty, and appear upon a glorious throne, arrayed with every magnificent decoration, and all the insignia of royalty: let him then declare his fiery indignation against every one of the proud tyrants and oppressors of the earth, and issue out his orders, that they should all be abased and trodden down, wherever they lived, and that their faces should be covered as condemned criminals, and either put to death, or confined in dark and noisome dungeons. And when, with a look or a word, he had effected this work, (as the Lord did in his own time and manner,) then it should be allowed that he had power sufficient to be his own deliverer and protector; though still unable to contend with the Almighty.

V. 15—24. There have been various opinions concerning behemoth: but probably the most ancient is the most true; namely, that the elephant is intended. This animal is the largest and most remarkable of the quadrupeds; it is unlikely that it should be totally omitted in this enumeration; and the several particulars seem best to accord with it. The Lord reminded Job, that he had made behemoth “with him,” both were his creatures, and behemoth is often found near the habitations of men. This immense animal eateth grass as an ox; for if he devoured flesh as a lion, he could neither be resisted nor satisfied: the strength of his loins and the sinews of his body are equal to his bulk; and it is known that the elephant often carries on his back a large wooden tower, with several men in it. His tail, or rather trunk, (for the word may mean either extremity of the body;) is very large, strong, and flexible, and by it he bears all down before him, as by the moving of a cedar. The sinews of his thighs are so interwoven, as to contribute very much to his vast strength, and his bones are so hard and firm, that they are like iron or brass. He is the chief of all the works of God, that is, of this kind: and it is evident that the elephant surpasses all other quadrupeds in size, strength, sagacity, and longevity; and yet is as remarkable for his gentleness, when not provoked. He is content to feed upon the herbage of the mountains; and the other beasts play around him without dread of harm. He lies down to rest, not in a den as carnivorous animals generally do, but under the shade of the trees, or in the reeds and rushes, as fearless of any assailant. When he drinks, he seems as if he would empty a river; and makes no haste, not being in the least fear. He seems as if he were confident that he could drink up Jordan at once: he greedily looks to the water when he thirsteth, and will not be kept from it by any impediments or snares; but removes them all by his trunk, which is situated above his nose. Probably it was not become customary at that time to take, tame, and employ elephants, in war or in journeying, as hath since been done. But though man did not know how to deal with behemoth, the Creator had him entirely in his power, and could destroy him at his will. This thought was suited to remind Job not to contend against his omnipotent Sovereign.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—8.

It behooves us to speak with great reverence and caution concerning the ways and works of God: for it will appear at length that many of our expressions sprang from such corrupt principles, and led to such desperate conclusions, as we could not deliberately excuse. Yet all our words must be given an account of at the day of judgment, and be produced as evidences of the frame of our hearts: and probably it will then appear, that the presumptuous cavils and objections of philosophic speculators, sprang from deeper enmity against God, and were more provoking to him than the scandalous profligacy of the profane and licentious. Indeed, when we murmur under correction, do we not contend with God, and dictate to him how he ought to deal with us? But can we seriously think that such weak and rebellious creatures have any right to be consulted, or are qualified to instruct, or authorized to reprove, the Almighty? We should therefore now judge ourselves on this account, that we may not be judged of the Lord. Every increasing discovery of the glorious perfections of God will proportionably humble us in the dust before him. One clear and distinct view of his holy majesty would appal the stoutest rebel upon earth; or even drive him to despair, if not tempered with discoveries of his mercy. How then will the wicked bear the blaze of his glory at the approaching day of wrath and judgment? Even believers have but faint apprehensions of his glory; and if they saw it more clearly, their self-complacency, in disputing with each other, would be turned into self-abbhorrence: their mouths would be stopped, or only opened to say, "Behold I am vile!" The subjects of their controversies, their management of them, and their whole characters, would appear in another light; and they would impose silence upon themselves, not knowing what to answer, and aware of having already spoken far more than they could justify. But when we see this glory of our God in the face of Jesus Christ, we are humbled without being terrified; and our deepest reverence and self-abasement consist with filial confidence and love. When we clearly perceive how vile we are, we are ashamed and grieved for many of those words and actions which before we vindicated: and when we truly repent, we retract what hath been improperly spoken, and sincerely purpose and attempt a change in our conduct and conversation.—The progressive renewal of a believer proceeds in the same way of conviction, humiliation, and watchfulness against remaining sin, as his first conversion did. If we have been much humbled before God, we need still deeper humiliation: if convinced of many evils in our conduct, we need convincing of many more: and every progressive step in this way makes us more and more sensible that we in no case have either right or reason to complain. Even when we protest against ill treatment from men, or vindicate ourselves from injurious charges, we are apt to reflect upon God; and to be so tenacious of our own right or reputation, as to neglect a proper regard to his honour; and we seem as if we would "disannul his judgment, "and condemn him, that we might be righteous."

V. 9—24.

The proud, stout, and profane words of sinners, might almost induce us to conclude, that they suppose themselves to have "an arm like God," and "can thunder with "a voice like his!" yet they are exposed without the least defence to his Almighty vengeance. Nor can words express their madness in persisting in rebellion, and neglecting his invitations to be reconciled. Alas! what is all the majesty, excellency, glory, or beauty, with which sinful worms can deck themselves? How impotent their rage! How vain their ostentation! The Lord alone can, and he certainly will, abase every one that is proud; either in true repentance, or as condemned criminals in destruction. And they who proudly trust that their own right hand, their own contrivances, efforts, or merits, can save them, will be numbered among these enemies and rivals of God.—Our consideration of the power, and our dread of the rage, of the beasts of the field, might teach us the folly of resisting the will, or provoking the indignation, of the Lord. Every haughty rebel should be reminded, that he who made him, can make his sword to approach unto him; and not only to destroy his temporal life, but fill his soul with unutterable anguish. Against him all power is vain, none can break through his snares, or out-brave his vengeance; though they drink down iniquity like water, and still covet and thirst for more, and make no haste to flee from the wrath to come. But on the other hand we may note, that it is well when the powerful are gentle and equitable; and love to see their inferiors secure, at liberty, and in comfort around them: and when content with the provision appointed for them, they do not injure, oppress, or defraud any one. The all bountiful Creator can supply our wants, however large; and he will, if we be content with what our nature requires, and be not desirous of meat or drink for our lusts, but seek first his kingdom and righteousness. Happy are they who trust in him, and leave him to manage all their concerns, who ordereth all things in heaven and earth, in perfect wisdom, justice, truth, and goodness.

NOTES.

CHAP. XLI. V. 1-11. It hath been much disputed what we are here to understand by Leviathan. Many interpret it of the crocodile: but the crocodile is an inhabitant of rivers, and leviathan of the sea. (Marg. Ref.) Others suppose the whale to be meant: yet naturalists find many difficulties in applying the particulars of the description to that creature. But there are several species of whales which are known, and probably others in different parts of the ocean with which we have but little acquaintance: and there is some reason to think that the deep contains enormous creatures, comprehended under that general name, which are much larger than any which have yet been taken. (Note, xxvi. 5-13.) As behemoth seems to denote the largest of the quadrupeds, so it is probable, leviathan means the largest of the inhabitants of the ocean: Moses especially mentions the creation of great whales; (Gen. i. 21:) and it is not likely that this animal, so particularly noted in the brief account of the creation, should be overlooked, when the Creator so copiously enumerated his works for the display of his own glory in them. The Lord, in order more deeply to convince Job of his presumption in contending with him, demanded of him, whether he was able to master leviathan? Could he draw him out of the sea with a line and hook, which might fasten through his tongue, nose, or jaws; after the various methods of taking other fishes?—Could he bring this prodigious animal to yield and become his suppliant, to speak him fair and court his favour?

Could he engage him in a covenant to be his servant, and to labour for him? Or could he tame or confine him for the amusement of his family? Would he and his acquaintance make a feast upon his flesh? Or, if it were unfit for that use, would he divide the oil and bones among the merchants? Perhaps in the days of Job, it was not thought possible to take whales as they now do: but some of the species might have been cast on the shore, and divided for the use of different persons. It, however, served equally for Job's humiliation, if he supposed it impossible to take them, as if it really had been so. He was therefore directed to consider, whether he was able to wound leviathan in his body, or head, with barded irons, or fish-spears, and thus to take him? He was challenged to lay his hand on him if he dared: but should he attempt it, and escape with life, he would remember his glorious situation so well, that he would not make another attempt. All hope of taking him would be vain: the very sight of him would daunt any man. None would dare to stir him up when asleep or basking on the surface of the ocean; and who would dare to meet him when enraged? How could Job then expect to prevail on his almighty Creator to alter his plan of government to please him, or to use his power to serve his interests or humour his wayward inclinations? For where was that man, who had first given to the Lord and made him his debtor, that he should have a right to demand payment; when all things in the whole universe were the work and property of God?

V. 12—34. The remainder of this chapter contains a particular and most sublime description of leviathan. The Lord declares, that he did not mean, by confining this prodigious animal in the vast ocean, to conceal from man "his parts, and power, and comely proportion:" for though we call such creatures monsters, and deem them mis-shapen, the Creator sees them to be formed in a suitable and becoming proportion of one part to another. At first sight leviathan appears exceedingly formidable: and who could draw near to him, to examine particularly his whole skin, which serves as his garment, or to strip it off from him? Who would undertake to bridle him like the horse for his use? Or to look into his mouth; when a sight of his teeth would make any man dread immediate destruction? The scales, (or strong pieces of shields,) with which he is covered as with an impenetrable coat of mail, are his confidence: by them he is secured, as if a seal fastened one part to another; so that no air can penetrate between them, no separation can be effected. When he neeses or spouts the water into the air, his breath sparkles like fire, and his eyes appear like the morning-light; so that burning lamps, and sparks, and smoke appear to be emitted from his mouth, as from under a furnace; and the flame, which attends his breath seems as if it would set coals on fire. His tail is joined to his body with the most surprising strength: and it is as if sorrow marched before him, exulting in the havoc that he makes of other creatures: or, however assaulted, his confidence in his own strength turn all his sorrows into joy. His muscles are immovable from: and his heart is incapable of fear or compassion, as if it were a mill-stone. When he appears above water, he causes such commotion and agitation in the waves, that the stoutest mariners are terrified, as in a furious storm; and betake themselves to confessions and prayers, expecting immediate death. No weapons either offensive or defensive are of any avail: he is undaunted by them; they make no impression on him or resistance to him; but he despises and derides them all. Indeed he inclines his enormous weight upon the sharp-pointed stones, at the bottom of the sea, with as much ease as if he lay on the soft mire. His motion in the deep maketh the waters to move, as ointment in a pot over a vehement fire. His path may be tracked by this violent commotion, and by the white foam which he leaves upon the waters. In the whole earth there is no creature equal to him, being formed destitute of fear. He beholds every other animal, or the stately ships and aspiring man, with contempt and disregard: he feels himself capable of ruling over the stoutest and proudest animals; and he hath more strength and courage, than the children of pride who exalt themselves against their Maker. It is undeniable, that several particulars in this description, do not accord to any species of whale, which is at present known: for none of them are covered with scales, or have an impenetrable skin:

but it less agrees with any other creature we know. The ancient fathers generally understood the passage as an emblematic, or typical description of Satan, that king over all the children of pride.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

Man was formed to be the lord of all other creatures here below: but his superiority consists principally in the powers of his rational nature, which teach him to submit to his Creator and to serve him: if therefore he continually forgets his place and duty, he should be reminded of his inferiority in other respects, even to many of the animals. Indeed some of these are so powerful and formidable, that we are by no means able to cope with them: how much then must the presumptuous transgressor be who defies the power and wrath of the Almighty!—If such sublime language was proper in describing the terrible force of leviathan; what words can express the power of God's indignation who is a consuming fire? He indeed beholds all high things in order to abase them: he resists and will crush all those who proudly exalt themselves against him; and who may stand in his sight when he is angry? But he more delights in showing his glory from the mercy-seat, and in encouraging sinners to take refuge under the shadow of his wings, and to prostrate themselves before him. If his anger be thus turned away from us, his omnipotence will be our protection; and then we need fear no enemy; though we shall have those that are far more formidable than leviathan. Satan, the king and father of all the children of pride, with his legions of evil spirits, is not confined to the ocean; nor can he be fenced out or resisted by our puny arm. Our wisdom, strength, and resolution, are unavailing in this unequal contest; and far more useless than sword or spear against leviathan: all opposition or hope of overcoming or escaping, if left to ourselves, would be in vain: his heart is stoned against compassion, and he hath been the cruel murderer of souls from the beginning: he rejoices in causing destruction: and he looketh on all the proud and lofty of the earth as his own. But the poor in spirit, who humbly trust to the Lord's mercy, are safe: relying on their almighty Assistant, they may defy and resist this tremendous foe, and be made more than conquerors over him. They must, however, remember, that they are saved wholly by grace: "For who hath prevented the Lord, that he should repay him?" And if they are mercifully rescued from the deserved wrath of God, and from the malice of Satan, they have no right to complain of any affliction or distress; or to boast of any wisdom, strength, or endowment of their own. Submission, dependence, and grateful obedience, are their part: it behoves them to revere the divine Majesty, to be abased under a consciousness of their own vileness, to take and fill their allotted place, to cease from their own wisdom, and to

Job, in deep humiliation, submits to God, 1—6. God decides in Job's favour, requires his three friends to present burnt-offerings for their sin, and submissively to engage Job to pray for them, 7, 8. They obey, and God accepts Job, 9. His prosperity is restored and doubled, 10—12. His children, 13—15. His age and death, 16, 17.

THEN Job answered the LORD, and said,

2 I know that ^a thou canst do every thing, and that ^b no thought ^{*} can be withholden from thee.

3 ^c Who is he that hideth counsel without knowledge? therefore have I uttered that I understood not; ^d things too wonderful for me, which I knew not.

4 ^e Hear, I beseech thee, and I will speak: ^f I will demand of thee, and declare thou unto me.

5 I have ^g heard of thee by the hearing of the ear: but now ^h mine eye seeth thee.

7 ¶ And it was so, that after the LORD had spoken these words unto Job, the LORD said to ^l Eliphaz the Temanite, ^m My wrath is kindled against thee, and against thy two friends: for ⁿ ye have not spoken of me the thing that is right, as my servant Job hath.

8 Therefore take unto you now ^o seven bullocks and seven rams, and ^p go to my servant Job, and ^q offer up for yourselves a burnt-offering; and ^r my servant Job shall pray for you; for ^s him I will accept: ^t lest I deal with you after your folly, in that ye have not spoken of me the thing which is right, like my servant Job.

9 So Eliphaz the Temanite, and Bildad the Shuhite, and Zophar the Naamathite, went, and ^u did according as the LORD commanded them: the LORD also accepted ^v Job.

give all the glory to their gracious God and Saviour.—When any man becomes proud of his personal strength and courage; let him be reminded of leviathan: when he is vain of his sagacity, ingenuity, or mental endowments, let him consider how much Satan excels him in them all. Let us all consider the holiness of our God, that we may be ashamed of our remaining unholiness: and remembering from whom every good gift cometh, and for what end it was given, let us walk uprightly and humbly with the Lord; for “before honour is humility.”

NOTES.

CHAP. XLII. V. 1—6. Job, borne down, as it were, with a torrent of light and conviction, at length answered, not in his own vindication, but with unreserved submission. He was fully assured that the Lord could do every thing; and therefore it was madness to contend with him, and folly to despair of help from him. He knew that none of his impatient thoughts could be concealed from God: or, perhaps he meant, that the Lord could not be prevented from accomplishing every thing which he intended. He had allowed these truths before peevishly, (xxiii. 13, 14;) but now acknowledges them with humble acquiescence, and not without hope of relief. In reproof of his presumption, God had said, “Who is this that darkeneth counsel by words without knowledge?” And Job here, in indignant astonishment at his own presumption, repeats the sentiment, and plead guilty to the charge, as if he had said, “Who indeed am I, a poor sinful worm, that I should venture to darken such deep subjects, by my ignorant and impatient discourses?” He confessed that he had spoken things beyond his knowledge, and too wonderful or mysterious for him to comprehend; and in a manner which merited the severest punishment. God had likewise commanded Job to prepare his answer whilst he proposed some questions to him, and blamed him for presuming to instruct the Almighty: but Job now humbly besought the Lord that he would allow him to speak; and that he would answer the questions he desired to propose, solve those difficulties with which he was perplexed, declare his truth unto him, and become his Instructor. He had indeed obtained some distant knowledge of God from education, instruction, and conference with his friends; and he had thought himself competent to discourse upon such subjects: but the scene, which he had now witnessed, had made such discoveries to him of the divine glory, and had so affected his heart, that, compared with this intuitive knowledge, all he ever knew before seemed to be but hearsay. He was now far more sensible than ever of his own guilt and pollution: so that he despised and abhorred himself as an abominable sinner in heart and life; but especially for his presumption and impiety, in murmuring against God. Of this, and of all his sins, he sincerely repented, and willingly took shame to himself for them: and whilst he abased his body in the dust and ashes as a humble penitent; he desired to lie as low in self-condemnation, and in the frame of his spirit before God, casting himself wholly on his mercy, and submitting unreservedly to his will. No doubt Job before this, had had spiritual and experimental knowledge of God in some measure; but nothing equal to what he received on this occasion. (Marg. Ref.)

sharp rebukes, his friends perhaps thought him altogether wrong, and themselves blameless and commendable; and it is not unlikely, that some readers have been ready to conclude, whilst we have gone through the preceding chapters, that the discourses of Job have been too favourably, and those of his friends too unfavourably, explained. But this chapter was all along considered as the clue of the whole narration; without which it would have been presumptuous to have decided positively and without hesitation. It is, however, evident, that the general doctrine of Job was more honourable to God and consistent with the truth, than that of his friends. They had misrepresented the dispensations of Providence, as if this world had been the state of retributions; and had greatly lost sight of the future state: they had considered extraordinary afflictions as a demonstration of wickedness, and as the effect of vindictive anger, rather than as trials and chastenings: and on this ground alone they had condemned a most eminent servant of God of hypocrisy and atrocious iniquity, and treated him with severity and disdain, while he was enduring the extremest sufferings, and struggling with violent temptations: and though Job had irreverently and impatiently, vindicated himself; yet on the whole his sentiments were true, and his arguments conclusive. When, therefore, the Lord had brought Job to deep repentance and a proper frame of mind, he answered his confidence and decidedly took his part. His friends, instead of a recompense for their service, as perhaps they expected, were informed that God was very angry with them, and would not forgive them; except they brought numerous and costly sacrifices as a confession of their guilt, and of their dependence on his mercy; and unless by proper concessions they induced Job to become their priest and intercessor, and to pray for them, while they offered their burnt-offerings. Four times in two verses God called Job his servant, as if he gloried in him in the midst of his poverty and distress, and when he was treated as a hypocrite. Him alone the Lord would accept, and his friends for his sake and in answer to his prayers; otherwise he would severely chastise them, and put them to shame, according to their folly, in misrepresenting his dispensations, and condemning his servant.—The prosperity of those who were more guilty, and the afflictions of Job who received this testimony of his superior piety, were indeed a refutation of their whole doctrine. Job, being himself humbled and pardoned, heartily and readily forgave them, and prayed for them: and they submitted to this humiliating expedient of making their peace with God. Thus a cordial reconciliation took place. Job's character was cleared and honoured: and if he were not an intended type of the Saviour, the whole history is suited to bring him to our remembrance.

V. 10—17. Whilst Job murmured, disputed, justified himself, and spoke contemptuously of his friends, his afflictions continued: but as soon as he repented and submitted to God, and forgave and prayed for them, the tide began to turn in his favour. “The LORD turned his captivity.” Some think that the Chaldeans and Sabeans were wonderfully disposed to restore to him his substance. His afflictions, however, by which he had been held as in bondage or captivity, were terminated; his reputation and honour were restored; Satan's permission was recalled, Job's health was re-established, his spirits were calmed, and his comforts renewed. All his relations and neighbours, who before had treated him with disdain, on account of his poverty and supposed hypocrisy, now came around him: being either afraid of disregarding one, who was a favourite of heaven, or desiring the benefit of his prayers and instructions, or through love and esteem. They consoled with and comforted him; and, according to the custom of those times, every one of them made him a present of a piece of money stamped with the figure of a lamb, and an ornament of gold for the ear or face. He seems likewise to have been again acknowledged and submitted to as ruler, and in process of time his substance was in every thing exactly doubled. But as a testimony that his children were not extinct, or lost to him by death, he had only the former number replaced to him; which, with those who had been removed to another world, doubled them likewise. After this he lived in prosperity and honour, no less than one hundred and forty years: probably above two hundred years in all: and instead of being written childless, as he once feared, he saw his posterity to the fourth generation; and at length died in peace, satisfied with living here, and ripe for a better world. Thus in every particular his integrity was evidenced by those testimonies which his friends had improperly demanded.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—6.

The Lord will assuredly bring those whom he loves to adore him, in humble submission and self-abasement. Their corrections will continue till they cease from murmuring, boasting, and censuring: but when they repent and kiss the rod, their deliverance draws nigh. Clear discoveries of the glorious power and wisdom of God, even in the inanimate or irrational works of the creation, tend to humble our pride, and to induce us to subscribe to his rebukes, and to the charges which his word brings against us; to fear his wrath above all things, and to expect every blessing from his favour. As none of his thoughts can fail of accomplishment; so none of ours can escape his notice, but must all be accounted for at the day of judgment.—Calm reflection will often convince us, “that we were hiding counsel by words without knowledge,” at the very time when we thought that we were fully declaring the truth in a clear and convincing manner: and grace in lively exercise will always influence us to confess without hesitation our sins, when we discover them; and without being much concerned to justify what was right, to take shame to ourselves for the things which have been faulty in our conduct. Even the true believer, in discoursing of heavenly things, is very liable to go out of his depth; and by uttering what he does not understand, and speculating on things too wonderful for him, he often exposes himself to rebukes for his rashness and irreverence. What then will be the case of the infidel, the skeptic, and the disputer of this world? They will be speechless, and despair; whilst all the world beholds the wisdom, justice, and goodness of those laws, truths, and decrees, which they arraigned and blasphemed as unjust, oppressive, and unreasonable. Instead of citing the eternal God to the bar of a rebellious worm, and calling upon him to answer our rash objections, it behooves us humbly to crave his instructions, and to be satisfied with the explanations, which he vouchsafes to give of those difficulties which intercept our path. For many hear of him from parents and teachers, and learn to discourse of his works and ways, who have no heart-affecting influential views of his perfections. After all they have heard, he is to them an unknown God; for they do not so know him, as to reverence, love, trust, and submit to him. Nay, believers who have some experimental acquaintance with God, may even in this world receive such clear discoveries of his glory, and experience so much of his power and love, that all which they know before shall seem as a mere report, compared with their present views. How then will it be when we shall see him as he is, and know him as we are known?—All true knowledge of God, proportionably humbles and abases us, and causes us to abhor ourselves, and repent in dust and ashes: but false doctrines and mere speculative knowledge puff men up, and feed their self-importance. By this criterion let us judge ourselves and our knowledge in religion: let us take care not to be put off with empty notions; or to be satisfied with present measures of humiliation and experience: for when we are the most abased as sinners before God, we are in the readiest way of being exalted by him. Did such self-abasing language suit the lips of Job, that most eminent saint and servant of God, at the moment when every grace was in its fullest exercise? and can any language be too humiliating for us? If we start and scruple to say that we abhor ourselves; or if we find, that we cannot do it with sincerity, does it not demonstrate that we have never perceived so much of the divine glory as Job had, and therefore are not made so sensible of our own guilt and pollution? For it would be very arrogant for any of us to suppose ourselves better by nature and practice, or more eminent in faith, patience, or piety, than this most approved and applauded character.

V. 7—17.

When the Lord hath duly humbled and graciously pardoned his servants, he will clear their reputations, silence their slanderers, answer their confidence, and exceed their largest expectations; and he will also teach them after his example to forgive, love, and pray for those who have injured them. In this frame of spirit they will be prepared to bear honour in an unassuming manner, and then he will confer it. He generally first rebukes those whom he most loves: but let not such as for a time escape be overconfident, for their turn will soon come. Even pious men may kindle the wrath of God against them, by not speaking humbly and honourably of him: but as all his controversies with us begin by our sin; so every reconciliation must be effected in that way which he hath revealed, and in the use of those means which he hath prescribed. They who refuse to come in this way, shall be dealt with after their folly: but no true believer or real penitent will finally persist in such a refusal. It is indeed very painful to be confuted, rebuked, and constrained to confess our mistakes and offences, and to beg the assistance and good offices of those whom we have despised, condemned, and injured. Yet the true penitent will submit to all this and more, when the will of God is known: his self-abasement will be proportioned to his former self-confidence: and whenever we approach God in his ordinances, such mutual concessions, restitutions, and forgivenesses, should first be attended to. (Marg. Ref.) Nothing cements the affections of believers, who have jarred or disputed, so much as praying with and for each other: when they enjoy communion with their common Saviour, they feel a disposition to delight in the communion of the saints; and to forget all which for a season interrupted it: and “the effectual fervent prayer of a righteous man availeth much.” We should be careful not to judge any thing before the time; we know not how the Lord may clear up one man’s character or expose another’s: and therefore we should be candid towards others, and jealous of ourselves. Neither are we competent to decide which is the most happy man; for the end crowns the day. When a man is oppressed, censured, and tempted, he appears very different from what he does when delivered and comforted: and he that is at ease can scarcely conceive what effect sharp trials would have upon him. Satan’s prevalence is limited in duration, as well as in degree: and when he is rebuked, the gloom of those whom he hath tempted will be dispelled, and way be made for their returning consolations. "When a man's ways please the Lord, he maketh even his enemies to be at peace with him:" he is graciously pleased with the very imperfect services of the humble believer; and when he has stood the trial, he shall come forth, as gold purified from the furnace. True religion mortifies that avarice which covets the wealth of other men, and that pride which induces numbers to scorn the needful, well meant, and proper assistance which is offered them. Whether the Lord give us health, long life, affluence, friends, and flourishing families, or not, we shall eventually be happy, if we patiently suffer according to his will: and those things which once we thought were altogether against us, shall at length appear to have been wisely chosen for our greater and more enduring good. (James i. 12.)—We know not for what good purposes our lives may be prolonged; and therefore should not be impatient for death, even when greatly afflicted. And whether our children and friends go before, or follow us, into the eternal world, they will not be lost to us, if the Lord hath made them partakers of his grace: this, above all things, we should seek, for an inheritance for them and for ourselves, being infinitely more valuable than all the wealth and personal accomplishments in the world. But though Job's trials and their happy event are replete with instruction and consolation, to the suffering tempted believer: yet we shall be still more edified and encouraged by looking unto Jesus. His abasement, temptations, and sufferings were vastly greater than those of Job; and he endured them with perfect patience, and they issued far more gloriously. For us he was tempted, and suffered, and emerged, and triumphed, and is glorified: for us, when we were enemies, he offered himself a sacrifice, and now for us he pleads before the throne. In him believers are pardoned and accepted: "he sees his seed, and prolongs his days, and the pleasure of the Lord prospers in his hands:" but there is no salvation in any other. To him we must come, in him we must confide, to him we must submit, and from him receive all that we can want: but we can give him nothing, except the honour of our whole salvation, and ourselves to be by his grace his redeemed and devoted servants. May we then experience his grace, share his victories, tread in his steps, and copy his patience: and we shall find in the event, "that the Lord is pitiful, and of tender mercy." But "we have need of patience, that after having done the will of God, we may receive the promise."

THE BOOK OF P S A L M S.

THE Hebrew name of this book is Tehillim, or Praises : because the praises of God form its grand scope and object, to which all other subjects contained in it are, in one way or other, rendered subservient.—The word Psalms is taken from the Greek, and denotes that these sacred hymns were, when sung, accompanied with the psaltery, harp, or lute : and indeed, from the time of David, psalmody, with various kinds of instrumental music, formed a considerable part of the daily worship at the sanctuary. The whole collection is often called, ‘ The Psalms of David.’ He indeed was, undoubtedly, the writer of the greatest part of them : his name is prefixed to above seventy Psalms : and he certainly wrote some, and probably many of those which are not expressly ascribed to him : concerning others, it remains doubtful who composed them ; but one is entitled “ The prayer of Moses, the Man of God ;” (xc.) and there is internal proof that some were written long after the time of David, and even during or subsequent to the Babylonish captivity. David, however, as the first who especially employed his poetical talents by the guidance of the Holy Spirit, in composing sacred poems, and who established or regulated the psalmody at the Sanctuary, was warranted to call himself “ the sweet Psalmist of Israel :” and to add, “ The Spirit of the LORD spake by me, and his word was on my tongue.”—Josephus informs us, that the Levites were enjoined to preserve at the temple all such hymns as might be composed in honour of God : and it is thought by some learned men, that the book of Psalms which we now have, was selected from a much larger number, as being divinely inspired, and so admissible into the canon of Scripture ; while many others were rejected, as not entitled to this honourable distinction. The entire book, however this may be, has certainly been considered as a part of “ the oracles of God” in every age, by an invariable testimony. St. Paul quotes the second Psalm expressly as a prophecy of Christ ; (Acts xiii 33 :) which implies that the Psalms were arranged after the same order, in general, as they now are. Nearly fifty of the Psalms are quoted or referred to in the New-Testament. Our Lord, proposing a question to the Scribes concerning the Messiah, introduces a passage from the hundred and tenth Psalm, in this manner, “ David himself said by the holy Ghost :” or “ David in Spirit calls him Lord :” and when instructing his disciples, after his resurrection, he says, “ all things must be fulfilled which are “ written in the law of Moses, and in the Prophets, and in the Psalms, concerning me.” In like manner, the apostle Paul, quoting a passage from the ninety-fifth Psalm, which he ascribes to David, uses this language, “ Wherefore as the Holy Ghost saith, To-day, if ye will hear my voice,” and the assembled Christian church applies the second Psalm to Christ, in these words—“ Lord, thou art God, who by “ the mouth of thy servant David hast said.” In so decided a manner is the divine inspiration of the Old Testament attested by Christ and his apostles.—The Jewish writers indeed are unwilling to bestow on David the title of prophet, and ascribe to him only a subordinate kind of inspiration ; according to the several distinctions which they have devised in this respect : but St. Peter expressly calls him a prophet ; and the number and clearness of the predictions he delivered, and which were evidently fulfilled after many ages, most fully prove him entitled to that character. And the several particulars respecting the descent, kingdom, and priesthood of Christ, the contempt and persecution he endured, and the intenseness and variety of his sufferings, the manner of his death, his resurrection, ascension, and glory, with the success of his gospel, and the calling of the Gentiles, are so circumstantially foretold in one or other of the Psalms, that a history of these events might in great measure be compiled from them : and in some cases with a minuteness to which historians seldom descend.—The words which our Lord used on the cross in two instances were taken from the Psalms ; and the insulting language of his persecutors was the very same that David above a thousand years before had put into their mouths. (Ps. xxii. 1. 8. xxxi. 5. Matt. xxvii. 43. 46. Luke xxiii. 46.)—Many Psalms indeed, are directly and throughout prophecies of Christ ; various passages in others must be interpreted of him : and David was so eminent a type of the Saviour, that his very name in some instances in the prophecies, is given to this his most illustrious descendant. (Is lv. 3. Ez. xxxiv. 23. Hos. iii. 5) But, besides this, that union which subsists betwixt the Redeemer and his people, and the conformity thence resulting, are of such a nature, that it is impossible but the same things should apply in many respects to both : though a discrimination must needs be observed in others. This may lead us to an obvious decision of the controversy which has often been agitated—whether all the Psalms should be applied to Christ or not. No doubt every pious mind will allow, that each of them either immediately points to him in his Person, character, and offices ; or may be so applied as to lead the believer's thoughts to Him, who is the centre of all acceptable religion : and probably there are few persons, who suppose that all the Psalms speak of Christ in exactly the same manner ; but rather according to the nature of the subject. It cannot indeed be doubted, but that the Psalms in general are devotional and experimental, the language of the gracious heart under its various exercises ; whether mourning for sin, thirsting after God, or rejoicing in him ; whether burdened with affliction, struggling with temptation, or triumphing in the hope or enjoyment of deliverance ; whether admiring the divine perfections, thanking God for his mercies, meditating on his truths, or delighting in his service. They are in great measure a divinely appointed standard of genuine experience ; by which we may judge whether, or how far our own desires, aims, fears, hopes, joys, and sorrows are spiritual ; and how far they are carnal, or verge to enthusiasm or delusion. The value of the Psalms in this particular is inestimable ; and the more cordially we can enter into the views, and appropriate the language of the Psalmist, the higher is our progress in genuine religion. ‘ The Psalms are an epitome of the Bible, adapted to the purposes of devotion. They treat occasionally of the creation and formation of the world, the dispensations of Providence, and the economy of Grace ; the transactions of the patriarchs ; the Exodus of the children of Israel, their journey through the wilderness, and settlement in Canaan ; their law, priesthood, and ritual ; the exploits of their great men, wrought by faith ; their sins and captivities ; their repentance and restoration ; the sufferings and victories of David ; the peaceful and happy reign of Solomon, the advent of Messiah, with its effects and consequences ; his incarnation, birth, life, passion, death, resurrection, ascension, kingdom, and priesthood ; the effusion of the Spirit, the conversion of the nations ; the rejection of the Jews ; the establishment, increase, and perpetuity of the Christian church ; the end of the world ; the general judgment, the condemnation of the wicked, and the final triumph of the righteous with their Lord and King. These are the subjects here presented to our meditation.—They are adorned with the figures and set off with the graces of poetry : and poetry itself is designed yet further to be recommended by the charms of music, thus consecrated to the service of God : that so delight may prepare the way for improvement, and pleasure become the handmaid of wisdom ; while every turbulent passion is calmed by sacred melody, and the evil spirit is still dispossessed by the Harp of the son of Jesse.—They present religion to us in its most engaging dress, communicating truths, which philosophy could never investigate, in a style which poetry can never equal ; while history is made the vehicle of prophecy, and creation lends all its charms to paint the glories of Redemption.—Besides their incomparable fitness to express our sentiments, they are at the same time memorials of, and appeals to, former mercies and deliverances—they are acknowledgments of prophecies accomplished’ (Bp. Horne’s preface to Psalms.) In commenting therefore upon this book, we should continually keep the Saviour in our mind : and whilst we consider who he was, and what he did ; how and why he suffered, and how he rose and reigns ; we should also endeavour to learn what his true disciples are, what they ought to be, and what they actually do aspire after. The literal meaning, as far as the Psalmist is concerned, should be adverted to, where it can be ascertained ; the particulars, in which Christ is predicted or typified, noted ; and the use that is to be made of every part of each Psalm to encourage the faith and hope, to direct the temper and conduct, to enliven the devotions, and to assist the self-examination of the reader, should be plainly shown.—We are also here continually reminded of what we must have to struggle against from within and from without, and how we may succeed in this conflict : and solemn warnings, and denunciations of vengeance against oppressors and persecutors, and the despisers and opposers of Christ and his gospel, are every where interspersed. This indeed has been considered as an objection to the use of the Psalms in public or private devotion, and a prejudice has arisen in some pious minds against several parts of them ; as if contrary to the Christian spirit : but, doubtless, the right spirit has always been the same ; and these parts must be considered, either as direct prophecies, or as divinely inspired declarations of the certain doom awaiting all the opposers of Christ and his cause or people ; and not as expressions of private resentment, or malevolence against injurious individuals. In short, there is nothing in true religion, doctrinal, experimental, and practical, but will present itself to our attention, whilst we meditate upon the Psalms. Scarcely any part of the book, but, when properly understood and accommodated, suits the case of private Christians, and may be usefully employed in public worship : and hardly an occasion of praise and thanksgiving can be conceived, to which some portion of them, faithfully rendered in poetical versions, may not be applied with peculiar energy and propriety: and indeed the Christian's use of them in the closet, and the minister's in the pulpit, will generally increase with their growing experience of the power of true religion in their own hearts. From this eulogium on this part of Scripture, let the reader be excited to meditate on it carefully for himself: but let him not expect too much from the expositor. Brevity must be consulted; a writer's inclination may exceed his ability; and at the last, the teaching Spirit of God, sought in fervent prayer, leading the pious soul into the genuine exercise of faith, hope, love, and gratitude, will do more to enable a man to enter into the Psalmist's views, than any human explication. If the author is enabled to suggest a few profitable hints upon each Psalm, he shall have occasion to be very thankful.

Various divisions of this book have been made, apparently without much reason. The present order seems to have been very ancient; though by no means coincident with the date of the several Psalms, which, indeed, have seldom much connexion with each other.—The Septuagint throw the ninth and the tenth Psalms into one, as also the hundred and fourteenth, and the hundred and fifteenth; and they divide the hundred and sixteenth, and the hundred and forty-seventh each into two.—Various other particulars respecting the titles, the dates, and the occasions of the several Psalms, will be noted as we proceed. The version of the Psalms, in our Bible, which was made by the translators employed by James the first, is posterior to that printed in our prayer books, which was executed in 1539. This last, as very excellent, and familiarized by custom, was retained in the Liturgy; though, as translated chiefly from the Septuagint, it does not so exactly correspond with the original, as does that in our Bibles.* (Grey's Key.) It may be added, that the former is in no respect comparable to the latter.

NOTES.

PSALM I. V. 1—3. This psalm is generally considered as a preface to the book, and supposed to have been prefixed to it by Ezra. It establishes the important distinction betwixt the righteous and the wicked; and assures us of the felicities of the former, and the misery of the latter. All men shun misery, and aim to be happy: but few understand that misery springs from sin, and that happiness can only be enjoyed in the favour of God. This the Scriptures declare; and by this light the believer seeks and finds it. In such portions of the word of God, we ought not to look for the way in which sinners are made righteous; or the origin of that difference which subsists among men, who are all of one nature: for they only inform us of the character of such as are accepted by God, and are in the way to heaven. The translation in our prayer-book renders this in the past tense, and though the original might very well bear that meaning, yet the context and the whole tenour of Scripture show that this cannot be the exclusive sense; for that would imply, that they alone were blessed, who never had walked in the counsel of the ungodly, nor stood in the way of sinners, nor sat in the seat of the scornful: whereas penitent believers, whatever their previous character has been, are partakers of the blessings which is evidenced by their subsequent conduct: and none else but they answer this description. The ungodly are those, however moral or virtuous, who profanely despise spiritual blessings, and live without any due regard to God and religion, as all unconverted men do. The counsel of the ungodly signifies, the maxims and principles of worldly men, who form their plans and calculate advantages or disadvantages, according to their several pursuits, without bringing the favour or displeasure of God or eternal things into the account: and walking in this counsel, signifies an habitual conduct formed on such principles, and regulated according to such rules. Sinners, in this climax, seems to mean, those who add to their ungodliness gross immoralities, and such crimes as natural conscience and the opinion of the world protest against. And to stand in the way of sinners, implies, the habit of such vices gradually overcoming the sense of shame and remorse of conscience, till a quiet, rarely interrupted by convictions, is supe-

4 The ungodly are not so: but are like the chaff which the wind driveth away.

5 Therefore the ungodly shall not stand in the judgment, nor sin-induced. Yet these occasional convictions are the source of uneasiness; and this prepares the sinner for "sitting down in the seat of the scornful." The scornful, no doubt, are such as encourage themselves and each other in ungodliness and wickedness, by infidel and atheistical tenets; and as have recourse to corrupt principles, to bear them out in corrupt practices; and so are given up to a blind and deluded mind, as a punishment of their conduct in following the impulse of a wicked heart. And to sit in the seat of the scornful, is to become teachers and apostles of infidelity, and impiously to ridicule, with all the genius, wit, and sense which they possess, the doctrines, precepts, and worshippers of God. The Septuagint translate the last clause, 'The seat of pestilences.' (Acts xxiv. 5. Marg.) thus "the simple ones love simplicity, and fools hate knowledge, and scorers delight in their scorning."—But the happy persons here described, have been preserved or recovered from these dreadful evils. They have, by divine grace, separated from all ungodly companions, and lost their relish for the vain pleasures of the world; they have learned to delight in the word of God, and to meditate continually upon it. This engages their affections, and occupies that time and those thoughts which others waste in vanity or sloth: thus they become like a tree planted in a well watered soil, which seasonably brings forth fruit, and abides verdant and flourishing; and whilst they are rendered steadfast and joyful in hope, and fruitful in holiness, they are made useful to others, and eventually prosper in the best desires and purposes of their heart.

V. 4—6. The Psalmist, having briefly stated the character and felicity of the righteous, contrasts with these the worthlessness and misery of the ungodly man, however distinguished. He is not only an unfruitful and withered tree, but he is despicable and useless as the chaff; he is readily driven from one delusion to another; and shall soon be torn away from all his worldly prosperity, and cast into hopeless misery. However his success may now be envied, or his character mistaken, the judgment of God will infallibly separate him from the congregation of the righteous. For the Lord hath appointed, and he approves, the way in which the righteous walk; he knows all its snares, dangers, and difficulties, and will watch over all that walk in it: but he leaves the wicked to the consequences of that way which they choose, and it leads directly to the pit of destruction.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The tendency of corrupt nature is from bad to worse. Men first forget and neglect God and his worship, and act from worldly maxims and principles; then they often venture upon gross and scandalous crimes; and at length they frequently settle in infidelity or an impious contempt of religion, and become the avowed and determined enemies of its doctrines and precepts. None know when ners in the congregation of the righteous.

they first shake off the impressions of a religious education, or venture to neglect known duty, how far they may be left to proceed: when inward and outward restraints are surmounted, they may rush downward into impiety and iniquity with accelerated force, as the stone falls to the earth. We ought to be thankful, if we have been preserved from these dreadful enormities, and have not been left to sit down finally in the seat of the scornful. And young persons should be warned not to venture aside into a path which leads to such fatal consequences: for numbers are left to wander from God, to be hardened in sin, and finally to perish. But blessed be God for the covenant of grace, and Jesus the Mediator of it: by his perfect obedience even unto death, he is become "the end of the law for righteousness to every one that believeth." Whenever the sinner becomes sensible of his guilt and misery, he may return by Christ the living Way, into the company of the righteous. In the exercise of repentance and faith, he separates from the company of the ungodly in which he can no longer delight. He cannot now act according to their maxims, or conform to their fashions, join in their pleasures, or relish their profane scoffs and jests. Perceiving the vanity of the world and the odiousness of sin, he begins to delight in the word of God, which shows him the preciousness of Christ and the beauty of holiness. Reading, and meditating daily upon, the sacred Scriptures with faith and prayer, he becomes "in Christ a new creature;" he has now new desires, pleasures, hopes, fears, sorrows, companions, and employments: his thoughts, words, and actions, are changed: he enters upon a new state, and bears a new character. "Behold all things are become new!" and the word of God is the support, comfort, and rule of his new and heavenly life. This man's religion does not consist in notions or forms; but in due season he will bring forth the substantial fruits of righteousness: for he is planted and takes root in a good soil; and through the word, derives from Christ those communications of divine grace, which gradually transform his soul into the Redeemer's image. Nor will his profession issue in apostacy: for his Saviour lives, and he shall live also; and though he may be tried and often disappointed, yet he shall find at last, that he had all profitable success in each of his undertakings. How different the character, prospect, and end of the ungodly! Their doom will be as dreadful as their characters were worthless; for being vessels of wrath fitted for destruction, they will be driven from the presence of the Lord into unquenchable fire. They may indeed here impose upon their fellow creatures, as well as deceive themselves: but the Judge will perfectly and finally separate them from the righteous; and will send them away into everlasting punishment, whilst he receives his people into life eternal. If we would then be happy, we must choose the way which the Lord knows and approves, though it be unfashionable, and despised; we must come out and be separate from the wicked:

we must learn to redeem our time for the study of the scriptures and attendance on God's ordinances: we must examine whether we can and do delight in these sacred exercises, and in any measure become fruitful in holiness. And if we meet with troubles by the way, we should keep the end in view: for surely we can never envy those, however prosperous or admired, who throng that broad road which leads to destruction.

NOTES.

PSALM II. V. 1—3. The occasion of this psalm might be taken from David's advancement to the throne, and his expectation of triumphing over the opposition made to his authority, both by disaffected Israelites and the surrounding nations: but it is throughout an evident prophecy of Christ, and repeatedly quoted as such in the New Testament; where it is ascribed to David, though his name is not prefixed to it. (Marg. Ref.) The Jews and Gentiles, the rulers and the people, sat themselves to oppose Christ, when he was condemned by the Jewish council, and crucified by the Roman authority, amidst the insults of surrounding multitudes. After his resurrection the same opposition was made to the establishment of his religion; and in every age, in one form or other, his kingdom has generally been opposed by the rulers of this world. But the event has uniformly proved, that this attempt, however wisely planned or vigorously conducted, was a vain thing, an ineffectual and ruinous contest against omnipotence; which originated from a rooted enmity to the authority and commandments of God, and the restraints which they impose on the self-will and corrupt passions of mankind.

V. 4—6. The almighty Sovereign, being fully aware of the intentions of his combined enemies, and able to disconcert them in a moment, disdained their impotent rage; as men deride and laugh at those who would but cannot hurt them: yet at the same time their enmity excited his wrath, and by his powerful word he determined to confound and destroy them: whilst he would establish his King, the Messiah, upon his throne and in his authority over his holy church; of which the temple, and its worship, and the kingdom of the house of David, upon mount Zion, were types. Accordingly, when the priests and rulers prevailed on Pilate to crucify their anointed King, they eventually forwarded his exaltation: and their persecution of his disciples drove numbers into remote regions, and thus greatly promoted the promulgation of the Gospel. —After a time, the Roman legions, the executioners of divine vengeance, surrounded Jerusalem; and at length destroyed the city and temple, and subverted both their civil and ecclesiastical state, with the most unheard of miseries and destruction of the devoted Jews; the wretched remains of whom to this day, scattered throughout the nations, unwillingly attest the fulfilment of this ancient prophecy. The Roman empire too, having set itself against the cause of Christ, began directly to decline, and at length sunk in the unequal contest. The emperor Julian, also, an apostate from Christianity, having undertaken to rebuild the temple and restore the Jews, was strangely baffled, and soon came to an untimely end: while the kingdom of Christ continues to this present time, in contempt and defiance of all the machinations of earth and hell. The Septuagint render the sixth verse, as the words of David or of Christ: 'But I have been constituted king by him,' &c.

V. 7—9. The King himself is here introduced, proclaiming the eternal purpose of the Father respecting his mediatorial authority, which was to be the recompense of his propitiatory sufferings. At his resurrection from the dead he was declared to be the Son of God. His sonship in this place seems mentioned as coeval with the decree, and not with the declaration of it. Christ is here recognized as the begotten of the Father, and as really partaker of the divine nature and perfections, as any son is of the nature of him who begat him. When he had accomplished his work on earth, he was authorized to ask and receive the heathen for his inheritance. For his mediatorial authority extends throughout the earth, for the benefit of his church: and all who are not made his willing subjects, will be as easily and entirely destroyed by his power, as a potter's vessel is broken by the stroke of an iron rod. —The divine appointment of David to be king of Israel, the special favour shown him, the victories he obtained, and the dominion he exercised over the surrounding nations, were very faint shadows of the intended events. V. 10-12. It would be vain to oppose the unalterable decree of God, that his Son should reign over the whole earth. It would therefore be the wisdom even of kings and rulers to submit; to fear the wrath and reverence the majesty of JEHOVAH, and become his servants; to rejoice in their superior rank with trembling, lest it should subject them to more aggravated vengeance; to do homage to Christ as their superior Lord, from whom they have their authority; to adore him as their God, and to welcome him as their Saviour, by the kiss of reverence, submission, and affection. Otherwise they must perish in their rebellion, far from the way of life: for even those who provoked this almighty King, by rejecting his authority, though without any circumstances of peculiar aggravation, would experience the terrible effects of his wrath: and all who put their trust in him, as their Saviour, would share the blessings of his righteous and merciful government. The evident fulfilment of the unequivocal predictions in this psalm, by a series of events exactly answerable to them, during the lapse of many ages, is in reality a full demonstration, that both the prophecy and the accomplishment were from God; and that our holy religion is of divine original and authority. The Jews themselves attest, that this psalm was extant many ages before the birth of Jesus; and many of them allow, that it principally relates to the promised Messiah, whom they are yet vainly expecting! And can any one be so absurdly skeptical, as to imagine, that human sagacity, or mere conjecture, could have suggested explicit predictions, which should at length be verified in the most exact and circumstantial manner, by events no otherwise to be accounted for than on scriptural principles, and by allowing them to have been effected by the power of God himself?

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

As this apostate world is in fact the kingdom of Satan, unconverted men of every rank, party, or character, may be excited by him to concur in opposing the cause of God, and the kingdom of Christ. But the kings and the rulers of the earth have generally been most instigated by the slanders and misrepresentations of false teachers, and other interested persons, as well as by their own prejudices and passions, to combine in this opposition. They do not brook submission to a superior; the humbling truths and spiritual precepts of Christ run counter to their ambitious projects and worldly lusts: and they are apt to suppose that this authority is inconsistent with their dignity or their felicity. Thus they are often excited to employ all their power and policy against the Lord, and against his Anointed; whilst they deceive themselves with the idea, that they are only opposing some obstinate sectaries who refuse submission to their edicts. But these are vain imaginations which the Lord disdains and abhors; and can effect nothing but the confusion and ruin of those who indulge them. For Jesus, the eternal Son of God, is established, and shall reign upon his holy throne, as the Saviour of his people and the avenger of his enemies. The decree of the Father has taken effect in part: the kingdom of the Mediator is fixed upon the ruins of Jewish and Heathen opposers; and it shall at length universally prevail, whilst every enemy shall be dashed in pieces by his iron rod. He was indeed crucified in apparent weakness; but he arose in power, and hath asked and received his kingdom over all things, for the benefit of his church. Let then kings and rulers, as well as their subjects, lay down their arms, submit to his authority, trust in him as their Saviour, and worship him as their Lord and God; and use all their influence, as his servants, to promote his cause, and advance his kingdom. Indeed we should rejoice with trembling in all outward distinctions and possessions; lest the abuse of them should enhance our condemnation: and even in our attempts to serve the Lord, we sinners have need to fear and tremble, lest we come short of his acceptance: but if we have submitted to the Saviour, and come to the Father in his name and merits, we may rejoice in him with reverence, but without consternation. For he casteth out none who come to him, however sinful they may have been; but they shall all be blessed for ever: whilst all who oppose, despise, neglect, or abuse his Gospel, and will not have him for their Saviour and their King, will incur his indignation; the effects of which even when kindled but a little, will be too dreadful for words to express, or imagination to conceive.

V. 1, 2. David abruptly, but in lively faith, addresses himself to the Lord, as amazed to hear of the numbers who followed the unnatural rebellion of Absalom; and especially that many whom he had favoured and trusted had joined his party. He also was astonished at the insolence and impiety of his enemies, and that they should interpret his troubles as evidences that God had rejected him, and either could not or would not help him. The meaning of the word Selah, which occurs three times in this psalm, and frequently in others, and also in the prophecy of Habakkuk, is not fully ascertained by expositors. Some entirely omit it: but this may be thought taking an unwarrantable liberty with Scripture: others suppose it to be merely a musical term, and the Septuagint seem to have thus understood it. In general, however, it appears to be used as a call on him who read or sang, to pause, and reflect: as something peculiarly important or surprising had been mentioned. 'Selah here signifies a lifting up ^{'the voice, to cause us to consider the sentence, as a thing of great importance.'} (Marginal Notes to Barker's Bible.)

V. 3—5. Instead of despairing of help and salvation from God, the afflicted Psalmist considered him as "a Shield around him," yea, as his glory. He had often called on God in trouble and danger, on former occasions, and had been heard: and having now, as in many former instances, committed himself to the divine protection by faith and prayer, he was enabled to sleep with as much composure as if he had been in perfect peace; and accordingly he was supported and protected from all injury.

V. 7, 8. The Lord had helped David, and disabled his enemies, when persecuted by Saul and his ungodly adherents; and he was confident that he would thus appear for him in his present distress: for salvation, temporal and spiritual, came from God alone: and he never failed to bless his faithful people.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The most excellent and eminent persons must expect opposition and ill usage; and they should prepare for ingratitude and contempt, as the recompense of their labours for the good of others. The number and power of their adversaries may become very formidable; and they may be astonished to find among them such as they have most depended on: nay, their very confidence in God will often be derided as delusion or presumption. Yet he is a Shield to all those that trust in him: they count their relation to him their glory, in preference to all dignities or achievements; and in all dangers they continue to hope that he will yet lift up their head above all their enemies. Indeed all true Christians should avow their confidence in God and their expectation from him, in seasons of deep distress; and be open, as well as fervent, in their prayers unto him, upon his mercy-seat in his holy temple. Thus they will enjoy safety and inward peace, in the midst of enemies and the alarms of war: for the Lord will hear and sustain them; and what are ten thousands of armed foes encamped against those whom the Omnipotent protecteth?—Past experience should encourage the hope of future answers to our prayers: we may even rejoice in the enmity of the ungodly, and desire that they may be deprived of their power to do mischief, but not that any further harm may befall them. Every temporal deliverance should be received as an earnest of eternal salvation; the honour of which must be ascribed to the Lord, who confers that blessing on his people. But we shall cease to wonder at the troubles of the king of Israel, and almost to think of our light afflictions, if we duly look unto Jesus, and contrast his glory and his grace with the contempt and cruelty with which he was treated. Having yielded himself to death, he sanctified the grave, and became the first fruits of the resurrection; his head was then lifted up above his enemies; and thus he hath opened the kingdom of heaven to all believers. His enemies, therefore, will surely be disappointed and perish: but his people may go down to the grave, as to their beds, in hope and comfort; for the same God watches over them in both, and they will at length awake to everlasting happiness.

struments with which the psalm was to be sung; or the tune to which it was set. Perhaps this psalm was composed on the same occasion as the foregoing.

V. 1. Of my, &c. By this expression the Psalmist acknowledged God as in all respects the Author and source of his righteousness, as being accepted and sanctified; and he appealed to him to do justice betwixt him and his unrighteous adversaries.

V. 2. My glory, &c. David might have considered his throne as an honour to him, seeing he was called to it by the special choice of God, and as a type of the Messiah: but the Lord himself, and his relation to him, were indeed his glory. His enemies derided him for this, and wanted to make him ashamed of it, or turned it into a reproach to him: while the vain grounds of confidence in which they delighted were deceiving them; and while they invented lies to make him odious.

V. 3-5. The piety of David evinced that he was the object of the Lord's special choice and favour, who having advanced him to the throne, as "the man after his own heart," would certainly establish his kingdom. His prayers would therefore be surely heard, and that would involve the ruin all his enemies. Of this he solemnly reminded them; and exhorted them to take heed what they did, to repent of their sins, to examine their own hearts, to hearken to the voice of conscience, to court retirement, to pause and reflect on their conduct; to bring the appointed sacrifices, with genuine repentance, faith, and piety, and thus to cast themselves upon the mercy of God for forgiveness and salvation. The Septuagint translates the clause here rendered, "Stand in awe, and sin not," be angry and sin not, which St. Paul seems to have quoted from that version. The original word signifies, being put into vehement commotion.

V. 6-8. Many inquire after happiness without knowing what it is, or where it may be found. But David had in this respect come to a decision. He could ask the Lord to smile on him as a kind Father, and to shine on him as a Sun; and this had often before made, and even now did make, him happier, than the greatest confluence of worldly goods could render the ungodly. Thus comforted, he pitied, but he neither envied nor feared, the most prosperous sinner: and could lie down and rise up in peace and confidence, assured of temporal protection and eternal salvation.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The servants of God, whose righteousness is of him, will have increasing experience of his faithfulness, power, and love: having been frequently enlarged when distressed in their souls, or in their circumstances, they call upon him with confidence: and they neither have, nor desire, any other plea, than that of his free mercy. The Lord alloweth them to glory and rejoice in him; nor shall the sons of men ever render them ashamed of their confidence: but all else is vain and fallacious; and the conduct of ungodly men is a mixture of hypocrisy, deceit, flattery, and slander. In proportion as we are conscious of devotedness to God, we have evidence that we are chosen and set apart by him, to show forth his praises and enjoy his love: nor can we ask more than he is ready to grant. Instead of reviling our slanderers, we should then warn them and expostulate with them, and invite them to seek a share in our happiness. This the vilest sinners may hope for, when convinced of their guilt and danger, and afraid to sin any more; when they begin to examine their hearts and to confess their sins; and when they seek opportunities of solitude and silent meditation. In every thing we ought to use means, and attend to the ordinances and commandments of God: but after all we must place our whole dependence on his mercy and grace. Let worldly men know, that the true Christian hath found that good which they are in vain inquiring after; whilst he enjoys peace and communion with God, he envies not their wealth or indulgence: and as he goes to rest at night in confidence of divine protection, so he can look forward to the grave as the bed in which he shall rest, till the joyful morning of the resurrection. But as this salvation is in Christ alone, where will they appear who despise his personal and mediatorial glory, refuse to have him to reign over them, and revile him in his disciples? Oh may they stand in awe, and no longer thus sin against their only remedy: may they come to him, and trust in his atoning sacrifice; and then offer their sacrifices of righteousness, of prayer, praise, and thanksgiving, and every good work, which through him are to the praise and glory of God!

PSALM V.

David prays, and purposes to persist in prayer, 1—3. He shows that God abhors the wicked, 4—6. He professes hope in God's mercy; and entreats his guidance, because of the malice of his enemies, 7—9. He prays that the wicked may be destroyed, and the righteous made prosperous and joyful, 10—12.

NOTES.

PSALM V. Title. Nehiloth is interpreted by some to denote wind-instruments of music; and Neginoth, stringed instruments. Others suppose that Nehiloth implies, that the psalm was sung in parts. But the word occurs nowhere else in Scripture, and the meaning of it is uncertain.

V. 4. It is not certain whether this psalm was composed during Absalom's rebellion, or while David was persecuted by Saul: but the latter seems most probable. The word, rendered meditation, seems to denote those inward thoughts, desires, fears, or sorrows, which break forth in earnest prayers, or find relief by complaining unto God.

V. 5. The word rendered foolish signifies insane or mad; denoting the infatuation of sinners, when urged on by their unbridled passions, to venture all consequences for the sake of present gratification. While men continue impenitent, their characters are abominable in the sight of God, they abide under his wrath, and if they die in that state, they must be eternally the objects of his abhorrence. The penitent sinner's character and state are changed, and he is reconciled to God: but sin is irreconcilably the object of divine hatred.

V. 8. 'My enemies would gladly see me trip, and they watch for my halting; therefore order my goings, that I may never fall and give them an advantage against me.' For with what triumph would they spread abroad

'my real faults, who now stick not to tell all manner of lies of me.' (Bishop Patrick.)

V. 9. St. Paul quotes this, among other scriptures, to prove the depravity of both Jews and Gentiles in their natural state; (Notes, Rom. iii. 10—20.) If the Israelites with all their advantages manifested such vile dispositions, in opposing the man after God's own heart, and afterwards in their conduct towards their promised Messiah; it is plain that the whole race must be corrupt and alienated from God; that nothing except an internal renovation by the Spirit of God can make them holy; and that they can never find acceptance with God, upon the ground of their own obedience to his righteous laws; but must be saved mercifully, if at all. The flattery, treachery, and calumny, with which the Israelites behaved towards their anointed king, originated from their hatred to God and holiness; and the profane, polluting, and abominable discourse, springing from the loathsome filthiness of their hearts, resembled the opening of a sepulchre, which would both be very noisome and unwholesome. Some, however, consider the open sepulchre as an emblem of rapacity and sensuality.

V. 10, 11. These verses might be rendered more literally as follows: 'Deal with them as guilty, O God; they shall fall by their own counsels. But all those that put their trust in thee shall rejoice, they shall shout with joy for ever, because thou defendest them. They that love thy name

‘ shall be joyful in thee.’ The future tense is indeed often used in the Hebrew for the imperative or the optative mood: and there is not that precision in it, as to tenses and moods, which prevails in modern languages. But where the literal rendering contains simply a prediction, and changing the future for the imperative or optative implies an imprecation or a wish, the literal version is certainly preferable. Yet it cannot be denied, that the form of imprecation is often used, as implying that the impenitent enemies of God and his Christ will perish, with the approbation of all holy creatures; and that the very prayers of believers for themselves and the church, will be answered, in the destruction of their enemies. (Marg. Ref.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

Before we offer our prayers unto the Lord, we should seriously meditate on his perfections and promises, and on our own character and wants; that our words may be spoken with recollection, from a full heart, in a due sense of our indigence, dependence, and unworthiness, and with fervency and expectation. If we willingly submit to him as our King, and worship him as our God, we may expect every thing from his almighty favour. Whilst many are eagerly presenting their petitions to earthly princes, let us make our requests known to our God and King. It is our privilege that we may come before him as often, and ask as much, as we will: and it must be our sin and folly, if we do not avail ourselves of his condescension and bounty. We should take care, that he may hear our voice every morning, as the first and best employment of the day; in order that we may find help and comfort from him in the various events of it: and let us not forget Him, “ who arose a great while before day, and departed into a “ solitary place, and there prayed;” lest we should yield to sloth, or admit carnal excuses for our negligence. In this sacred exercise, our affections should be directed to the Lord, and we should look up to him for help; expecting an answer from him, as we do to a letter which we have directed to a kind friend. Such prayer will determine the heart against every sin: for though the Lord pities sinners, yet he has no pleasure in iniquity; nor can we walk or dwell with him, whilst any sin reigns in our hearts. How great then is the folly and madness of the wicked! and how will they endure to be driven from his presence, as the objects of his unchangeable and eternal detestation! Indeed we none of us could come before God, if it were not for his abounding mercy: humility and reverence then become us in all our worship; and we must always look unto Jesus Christ, the true temple, in whom God dwelleth as reconciled to the believing sinner. His true worshippers will have many enemies and observers, which will increase their temptations, and render their path more perplexed: but if this excite them to greater watchfulness, and render them more fervent in prayer to be led in the straight way of righteousness, it will be of great service to them. We need not wonder at the cruelty, treachery, hypocrisy, or flattery of our enemies; when we consider how David and how Christ was treated: but we should remember that we are by nature as depraved as they: that we may renewedly repent of the sinful thoughts, words, and actions of our past lives: that we may still watch over our own hearts, and against all polluting or dissembling conversation; and that we may bless God for restraining or converting grace, and for Jesus Christ and his salvation. We must by no means desire and pray for the destruction of our enemies; but we may predict the ruin of God’s enemies, who will fall by their own counsels, and in the multitude of their iniquities; and their enmity to his people will be proved to have sprung from their rebellion against him. But we should earnestly pray for, and help the joy of, the righteous: they trust in the Lord’s mercy, grace, and providence, and desire to love his name and walk in his ways: he is their Shield and Salvation; and his favour shall protect and bless them for ever.— Neither their former sins, nor their present defects, temptations, conflicts, or troubles, should be allowed to silence their praises, or prevent their rejoicing. Joy is their privilege, their duty, and their strength; and they should be exhorted to “rejoice in the Lord always.”

PSALM VII.

David, protesting his innocence of the crimes charged on him, entreats God to protect him from his enemies, and to plead his cause for the sake of the people, 1—9 He expresses his confidence in God, predicts the destruction of persecutors, and determines to praise the Lord, 10—17.

• Shiggaion of David, which he sang ^a unto the LORD, concerning the ^b words of Cush the Benjamite.

b Or, business.

V. 5. The Psalmist pleaded, that if God cut him off in his wrath, it would terminate all his opportunities of serving and glorifying him on earth; and if left finally to perish, he should never remember God with gratitude and praise any more to eternity. The word rendered grave, is often translated hell, and it seems generally to mean the place of separate spirits, happy or unhappy, according to the context: yet it sometimes must be understood of the grave, and that seems the sense in this place.

V. 6, 7. Bowed down by most distressing sickness and sufferings of various kinds, and conscious of deep repentance; which, concurring with his corrections, caused him, every night, to water his couch with copious tears, and made him waste, become dull-sighted, and grow old prematurely; David earnestly pleaded with God to visit him in mercy, without further delay.

V. 8—10. The Psalmist, having deeply humbled himself before God, at length found his peace and hope revive. As he trusted that the Lord would not leave him to perish in another world with the workers of iniquity, he resolved not to associate with them in this: and he warned them to repent and cease from their enmity to him; otherwise he was assured that shame and vexation would suddenly and irrevocably seize upon them. Many mournful psalms end thus triumphantly, for the encouragement of other mourners to hope and pray. The old version, more literally, thus renders the last verse: ‘all my enemies shall be confounded and sore vexed; they shall be turned back, and put to shame suddenly.’

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

Infidels, profligates, and hypocrites, have always more noticed David's sins than his mourning for them: for the former serve for an objection to the truths they hate, and an excuse for the sins they love; but they are not disposed to imitate him in the latter. Great tenderness of conscience, and a disposition to mourn for sin with brokenness of heart, distinguish the believer from all other men; he may be overtaken in a fault, nay, he may fall into grievous transgression: but recollection fills him with anguish; or, if for a space he be, as it were, stupified, rebukes and corrections will bring him to himself: and while conscience performs its salutary, but painful office, and he is suffering under the rod of his offended Father, he not unfrequently becomes afraid of his hot displeasure. Ashamed and trembling, he then deprecates eternal misery. Pains and enfeebling diseases, which vex his bones, may excite his prayers for deliverance: but the sense of divine wrath, which vexes his soul, renders him most earnest in crying out, “O LORD, how long?” How long will it be ere thou givest me some token of thy pardoning love; ere thou returnest to glorify thy mercy in saving my soul? Such a penitent desires to live on earth to remember and give thanks to his God: and he seeks the deliverance of his soul from hell, and the resurrection of his body from the grave, for the same purpose. To enjoy the favour, and celebrate the praises of his God and Saviour, form that happiness on earth and in heaven which he desires: but he cannot endure the thought of ceasing for ever to love and praise him. His sorrow for sin is inward, and flows most in retirement: groans and tears express the compunction of his heart; and when his crimes have dishonoured God, and caused his enemies to exult and triumph; and when returning comforts are withheld, his spirits are exhausted, his eye is dimmed, and he seems to wax old before his time. But such mourning will issue in rejoicing: the Lord will not number the weeping penitent with the workers of iniquity; for he will separate from them, and rebuke and warn them. His very tears have a prevailing voice with God, who hath heard and will hear his prayers: and all they who rejoice in the falls and sorrows of the Lord's devoted servants, will be “put to shame, vexed, and perish suddenly,” unless they repent. Sinners of every rank have sorrowed and wept for their transgressions: but Jesus alone was a sinless sufferer; and through his sufferings, and in no other way, can the penitent find mercy. But at length he will bid the impenitent workers of iniquity to depart from him; then will all his enemies be confounded, vexed, and perish with an everlasting destruction.

NOTES.

PSALM VII. Title. Shiggaion signifies wandering or variable; and, it is probable, denotes the music to which the psalm was set. Many conjectures have been formed concerning Cush: but at last we only know that he was of the same tribe with Saul, and most likely one of his relations and courtiers, who brought some false accusation against David.

V. 1, 2. In extreme danger, the Psalmist, according to his custom, resorted to God by faith and prayer. He had many persecutors: but it is probable that the one whom he distinguishes from the rest, was Saul; who was so enraged against him, and had so much power in his hands, that he both could and would have torn him in pieces, as a lion doth his prey; nor would any have attempted to deliver him, had not God been his Protector.

V. 3-5. David here appealed to God for his innocence, as to the charges brought against him. So far from having risen up, as an enemy or a traitor against his prince, when at peace with him; or even returned evil for the evil requital his eminent services had received; (as some explain the clause;) he had twice preserved the life of his treacherous and implacable persecutor, who had not the smallest cause for his cruel enmity. (Marg. Ref.) If this were not the case, and if the accusations of his enemies were true, he was willing to lose his life and reputation, and to be exposed to the deepest ignominy. In the Latin version the word Selah is here rendered maxime, 'Lay mine honour in the dust, exceedingly.' It is frequently rendered in the same manner.

V. 6, 7. David was assured that the Lord intended to cut off Saul; (Marg. Ref.) This was the judgment which he had commanded, and for which David prayed; not only on his own account, but for the sake of the people. Saul's tyranny and neglect of his duty had crushed and scattered the Israelites: and his persecution and impiety had driven them from the ordinances and worship of God, and seduced them into many crimes. The Psalmist therefore prayed that the righteous Judge would ascend his tribunal, exert his omnipotent authority, and by some visible interposition check the progress of impiety, and give encouragement to his servants; that they might again be collected in his courts, and unite in his holy worship.

V. 8-11. The heart-searching Judge of the world, not only decides on men's conduct towards him, but in all the causes between one and another. To him, therefore, David referred the cause between him and his persecutors, desiring to be judged, in this respect, according to his righteousness and integrity, which were known to God. He both prayed that the wickedness of the wicked might cease, and predicted that it would; and that God would establish the righteous. He was assured that the righteous Judge and the Preserver of the upright, would defend him as a Buckler, (Marg.) and would at length manifest that anger, which was every day excited by the crimes of his enemies. —'How few among Christians seriously and deliberately consider whether the sentence of that day,' (the day of judgment,) 'is likely to be in their favour; yet how many with the utmost composure and self-complacency, repeat continually the words of this psalm, as well as those in the Te Deum, "We believe that thou shalt come to be our Judge." (Horne.)

‘creed in heaven, (if they do not repent,) and will pierce through the heart of Saul, and the rest of my fierce and outrageous persecutors.’ (Bp. Patrick.) (Marg. Ref.)

V. 14—16. ‘When an evil thought is instilled into the heart of a man, the seed of the wicked one is sown; by cherishing the diabolical suggestion “he conceiveth” a purpose of mischief;’ then “he travaileth with iniquity,” and at length, by carrying it into action he “bringeth forth falsehood.” (Horne.) The persecutor especially being determined upon iniquity, is restless and in torment, till he can effect his purpose by any method of deceit and violence. But, with vast expense and trouble, he only digs a pit for himself, and the ruin he aimed at others, falls on the crown of his own head, and gives him a mortal wound. ‘Thus Saul was killed by the Philistines,’ whom he wanted to employ in cutting off David; and the Jews, who excited the Romans to crucify Christ, were destroyed by them, and even crucified in great numbers. (Marg. Ref.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The servants of God must expect the persecution of the tongue, as a preparation for further injuries; and to the ingenuous mind it is very formidable. But no slanderers or persecuting tyrants can do real harm to them who trust in the Lord their God: when there is none else to deliver, he will take care both of their persons and characters, and will preserve them from Satan, that “accuser of the brethren,” and “devouring lion,” and “from every evil work unto his heavenly kingdom.” Let us then wage our warfare with the weapons of faith and prayer; and instead of injuring our peaceful neighbours, let us persevere in endeavouring to overcome evil with good. This will enable us to rejoice in the testimony of our consciences, when loaded with slander and obloquy, and to appeal to God with confidence. But ‘wretched they who persecute their benefactor. Happy he who can reflect that he has been a benefactor to his persecutors.’ (Horne.) Indeed the Christian would deem himself worthy of all the injury and ignominy which his foes intend him, were he guilty of the crimes of which they accuse him. But whilst we patiently bear the injuries to which we are exposed, we should be moved to behold “one sinner destroying much good;” and we ought to pray that the Lord would convert or remove all those who scatter and oppress his people; and effectually interpose to encourage their faith and obedience, and to stop the growth of impiety and infidelity.

The glory of God displayed in the works of Creation, 1—3. And in his condescending love to man, 4—9.

When earthly judges abuse their power, it is a comfort to reflect that the Lord will reverse their decrees, and plead the cause of his people: he is a Judge who “trieth the heart and reins:” nor can we stand before him, even according to his new covenant of mercy, without simplicity and godly sincerity, and conscientious integrity in our whole conduct. The Lord is every day provoked by the wicked; and whilst he waiteth to receive the submissions and pardon the sins of those who repent and turn to him, he is preparing to execute judgment on all the impenitent. But persecutors must expect his severest vengeance. Satan suggests, and they welcome, the mischievous imagination; and iniquity and murder are thus conceived, and then effected by lies and treachery. Let them, however, remember, that they are only plotting their own destruction: for the persecuted servants of the Lord will be celebrating his praises, and rejoicing in his favour, whilst their persecutors are cast into the pit of destruction, and enduring the wrath of their righteous Judge: and all their subtle projects will concur in bringing about this final event. Let us then, under all our trials, look unto the Saviour. He alone was perfect in righteousness; yet none was ever reviled, slandered, and hated as he was. He lived and died doing good to and praying for his enemies: but after his exaltation, the welfare of his church required that judgment should be executed upon such as continued impenitent. The Jews first felt the weight of his indignation: and then vast multitudes of gentile converts compassed him about. And wherever anti-christian corrupters or persecutors have been from time to time destroyed, the church has been replenished with numerous real converts to the faith; and when these enemies of the truth shall finally come to an end, the whole earth will be filled with truth and righteousness. Shortly will arrive that final judgment which God hath decreed; then all unbelievers will finally perish: may we at that solemn season, be numbered with his saints in glory everlasting!

NOTES.

PSALM VIII. Title. Gittith perhaps is the name of some tune which David had learned when in Gath, or from the Gittites, and to which this and two other psalms were set. Various other conjectures have been formed; and the following may be considered as the most probable. ‘I take it to have been composed by David, after he had overthrown Goliath of Gath; which is a lively emblem of Christ’s conquest over our great enemy the devil.’ (Bp. Patrick.)

V. 1. The eternal JEHOVAH, the universal Creator and Benefactor, is that Lord and Governor, whom all ought entirely to obey and serve : and to him believers render willing obedience as their Redeemer. He infinitely excels all creatures, in every thing which can excite love and adoration. The earth is full of the discoveries of his perfections : and his glory fills the highest heavens, and is exalted far above them.

V. 2. God hath often magnified his own perfections, through the simplicity and weakness of the instruments by which he accomplished his grand designs. The newborn infant is such a display of his power, skill, and goodness, as unanswerably to confute the cavils of Atheism. Even little children have been taught so to love and serve him, that their praises and confessions have baffled and silenced the rage and malice of persecutors : and thus a victorious strength has been manifested by them ; while the wise, learned, and mighty, have either joined the enemy, or timidly and feebly crouched before him. The meanest and most despised persons have often been made successful in their attempts to promote his cause. Thus David overcame Goliath, though but as a babe in comparison of that insulting champion : and the despised Nazarene, with his obscure and unlettered apostles, prevailed against the combined wisdom, learning, and power of the world and the sagacity and influence of Satan, the god of the world. And by successive instruments whom man disdains, the same cause shall still more fully prevail, till every avenger and enemy is finally stilled, and all the wicked are silent in darkness. The Septuagint renders the clause which is here translated, according to the Hebrew, ordained strength, perfected praise ; and the Evangelist, recording our Lord's words, gives them according to that version. The above interpretation is intended to show the coincidence of it with the literal rendering.

V. 3. The Psalmist appears to have composed this sacred hymn while his attention was fixed, during the silence of the evening, on "the moon walking in brightness," and "the glittering stars of light:" but instead of being tempted to worship the heavenly host, he contemplated the magnificent scene, and the immensity of the creation, till he was filled with adoring admiration of the Creator's incomprehensible majesty ; which naturally suggested the subsequent reflections.

V. 4-9. Adam, even when created in the image of God, was infinitely beneath his Maker, and it was an unspeakable favour for him to be placed at the head of this lower world, in a state of honour and dominion. After the fall, it was still more wonderful that his children should be permitted to retain any authority over, or derive any benefit from, the different orders of creatures. But the apostle teaches us that the Holy Spirit, who spake by David, especially intended Christ, the eternal Son of God, who by his incarnation became the Son of man. Thus he was "made a little lower than the angels," by assuming and dwelling in a nature inferior to their's, "for the suffering of death;" which object having been accomplished, he arose from the dead, and was "crowned with glory and honour;" and in human nature exercises universal dominion, even an authority infinitely more extensive and absolute than ever the first Adam possessed, or could possibly have administered. In so wonderful a manner did the God of glory show himself mindful of mean, feeble, mortal, sinful man ! and thus has he visited and honoured one of our fallen race, for the common benefit of all who believe in him. (Marg. Ref.)—The word, rendered angels is the same which is generally translated God or gods : yet the apostle from the Septuagint renders it angels ; which shows the latitude with which the term is used. But when the true God is meant, it is, though plural, always joined with the singular verb ; and the name JEHOVAH is never given but to the true God : for when applied to Christ, it shows who he is, even "the true God and eternal life." (Notes, Heb. ii. 5-9.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

No words can express the glorious excellency of JEHOVAH, our Ruler and Lord : nor can Cherubim or Seraphim reach his worthiness by their most exalted adorations : yet he graciously accepts the feeblest efforts of men on earth, and even counts himself honoured by the praises of babes and sucklings ! He works by the feeblest instruments, for the greater confusion of his enemies and honour of his name ; and all the vengeance and rage of earth and hell shall soon be stilled by the prevalency of his despised gospel. Every creature speaks the Creator's praise to the mind of the devout believer ; whose pious contemplations render his solitary walks unspeakably pleasant and profitable. But each display of the divine glory should lead us to reflect

PSALM IX.

David praises God for punishing his enemies, and maintaining his cause 1—6. He shows that God will preserve his servants, and calls on them to praise his name, 7—12. He prays for deliverance from present trials, that he may still praise the Lord; and predicts the ruin of the wicked, 13—20.

on our own vileness. What indeed is man, that the Lord should still visit, and be mindful of him? What are we but mean, guilty, polluted, ungrateful, rebellious, and apostate creatures? We are unworthy of the least of those manifold advantages, which we derive from the sheep and oxen, the fishes, and the fowls, and the other animals, which are still subjected to us, and subservient to our benefit : nor should we ever partake of these common mercies, without admiration joined with gratitude. But in the person of Emmanuel, every other instance of divine condescension is eclipsed, all our thoughts are swallowed up. His love, his humiliation in assuming our nature; his atoning sufferings unto death; his subsequent glory; and his dominion over all creatures, which shall endure till all enemies are put under his feet, can never sufficiently be admired and adored. Thus our nature, in the second Adam, is infinitely more honoured and exalted, than it could have been in the first Adam. Thus also the true dignity of human nature, even the worth of a rational immortal soul, though ruined by sin, yet capable of recovery and eternal felicity, is clearly shown. And if we trust and submit to Christ as our Saviour and Lord, he will advance us also to glory, honour, and immortality. We had indeed cause to celebrate the excellencies of the Lord our Governor, as displayed in the works of creation : but what words can reach his praises, who is now become our Salvation, and has acquired a new right to our subjection, as our Redeemer, and for filling the earth with those glories, “which angels desire to look into!”

NOTES.

PSALM IX. Muth-labben. This word is translated in various ways by different expositors : but the meaning of it remains doubtful. Muth signifies death : and some imagine that labben may denote Goliath, either in respect of his eminence, or his coming as a champion between the armies of Israel and that of the Philistines : but if this be the meaning, it is very obscurely expressed ; and as Zion was not the place of Israel's assembling for public worship, till David had for some time been king of all Israel, the Psalm must have been composed long after Goliath's death. (11—14.) Others suppose Muth-labben to mean, the death of his son, and refer the occasion of the Psalm to the death of Absalom : and this better suits the real date of it ; yet it is not satisfactory. The Psalmist, however, might have some reference to the various deliverances of his past life ; and be also led, while praising God for them, to speak as the type of Christ, concerning his conflicts and victories ; and those of his church, and of her triumphs over every heathen and anti-christian persecutor ; and also of the trials and deliverances of every believer.

V. 1—3. The Psalmist determined, on occasion of some recent deliverance, to praise God with his whole heart, not feignedly, not as ascribing any share of the honour to himself, not in a cold and languid manner : but fervently and zealously. He would make the works, which God had wrought for him, known to all around : and thus rejoice in ascribing glory to his name, and in reflecting what a powerful and faithful Patron and Friend he had, and what an honour and benefit this was to him. His enemies hitherto had been turned back, and stumbled and perished, not by his valour, but by the presence and power of God : and this made him confident of continued victories and final triumph. This admits of the most obvious application to the works of God for his church, and for every believer ; and no doubt was intended by the Holy Spirit, to be thus used in our worship and meditations.

V. 4—6. God had pleaded David's righteous cause against the wicked persecution of Saul, and had advanced him to the throne of all Israel, with the destruction of almost the whole family of Saul. He had given his king the victory over the surrounding heathen nations, who perished in great numbers, and had finally lost the reputation of their former successes. So that every enemy that had before destroyed the cities of Israel, was deprived perpetually of power to continue these desolations ; and most of them soon became so insignificant, that the memorial of them and of their former greatness, perished with them.

—The marginal reading here seems to give the proper sense. The destructions caused by the enemy were terminated :

God had destroyed their cities; and the remembrance of them had failed from among men. Thus likewise the renowned monarchies, that successively made havoc on earth, and oppressed Israel, are now destroyed and almost forgotten: the first opposers of Christ and christianity have shared the same fate: and all these divine interpositions are earnest of the final ruin of all the enemies of the cause of Christ.

V. 7—12. The reflection on the transient glory of earthly kingdoms and illustrious conquerors, led the Psalmist to reflect on the eternity of JEHOVAH and of his universal kingdom. This eternal Sovereign did not, indeed, immediately inflict vengeance on his enemies; but his throne of judgment was prepared. He would soon judge the whole human race in righteousness; and uprightly, or according to his declarations and promises, decide on the cause of each individual belonging to the people of Israel. In the mean while, He would prove a refuge for the protection and comfort of such as were oppressed or persecuted for his sake, to which they should resort in times of trouble or danger. Indeed all who by believing his word and experiencing his faithfulness and mercy, had obtained the knowledge of his name or perfections, would trust in him entirely and exclusively; for it had never been known, that the Lord had forsaken any that sought him, because of their weakness, or the power of their enemies. But it was only, as dwelling in Zion, through the sacrifices and ordinances which typified the promised Saviour, that He could be sought by sinful men with acceptance; and therefore his people should abound in praising him, as the God of Salvation; and making known his works, that others might learn to seek and serve him. He sometimes indeed let his servants be tried by persecution: but there would be a season of inquisition for blood, when the prayers of the humble would be remembered, and completely answered.

V. 13, 14. David, after all his triumphs, still had enemies, conflicts, and trials: the church, though victorious over all former opposers, is still militant here on earth: and the believer, though rescued from the gates of death and hell, and enabled to bless God for many deliverances, must still encounter with troubles and temptations, and mingle prayers with his thanksgivings. The expression “the daughter of Zion,” seems to denote the inhabitants of Zion, with all those who came to worship at the sanctuary now placed there, as one collective body, the visible church, the type of the true church, which God our Saviour has espoused to himself, and which in the true mount Zion, the heavenly Jerusalem, shall show forth all His praises, who hath lifted her up from the gates of death, and raised her to that glorious felicity. The contrast between the gates of death, and the gates of the daughter of Zion, is remarkable. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 15, 16. The several nations, who had engaged in war against David, had only brought destruction on themselves by all their combinations and stratagems; and given JEHOVAH the occasion of manifesting his power and justice, in the judgments which he executed upon them. To this reflection the Psalmist adds, Higgaion Selah; which the Latin version renders, Rem meditandam summe, a thing to be meditated on with the greatest attention: and it is probable, that this is the true meaning of the two words thus connected. The example was very instructive, and ought to be deeply considered by the enemies of God for their warning, and by his servants for their encouragement in seasons of trouble and danger.

V. 17. ‘All wickedness came originally with the wicked one from hell; thither it will be again remitted; and they, who hold on its side, must accompany it, on its return to that place of torment, there to be shut up for ever.’ (Horne.) This will be the case even with the nations who forget God, and their obligation to him, and that worship and obedience which they owe him: for this forgetfulness is the effect of contempt and aversion, it deserveth his wrath, and it is the source of all other crimes.

The future condemnation of the wicked seems to be intended ; for as men go down to the grave, the word, rendered hell, must in this connexion have a more awful meaning.

V. 20. Many princes have claimed and received divine honours ; we know the arrogant titles of infallibility and of his holiness, which one chief anti-christ hath assumed : and the proud and impious conduct of multitudes too evidently proves, not only that they forget God, but that they forget themselves to be men, sinful, weak, and dying creatures, who will soon be called to give an account of themselves to God. According to our version, David prayed that these haughty enemies of the Lord and his people, might be so terrified, as to recollect their own weakness, and submit to Omnipotence : but the Septuagint translates the first clause, "Place a lawgiver over them ;" indeed the original word seems to mean a Teacher or Lawgiver ; and in this sense the prayer is for instruction and conversion.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

All our mercies should be acknowledged before God in fervent praises : the whole glory belongs to him ; our whole heart should be lifted up to him ; in rendering him this tribute ; we should delight in showing forth publicly his marvellous works to us and to his church : and our joy must not rest in any of the gifts of our God, but ascend to him, and centre in him as our all-sufficient Portion.—The enemies of Christ and of his people for a time may stand their ground, and seem to prevail : but in due season they will be dismayed ; and, beginning to fall, they will perish at his presence. He, who advanced David, and maintained his righteous cause ; he that exalted the Saviour to his own right hand in heavenly places, in defiance of his enemies, will shortly bring to an end the wickedness of persecuting tyrants, and they shall perish with eternal infamy : and this almighty Lord will help the Christian in all his conflicts and temptations, and support and comfort him in all his troubles, till he be finally delivered from the body of sin ; and till Satan be bruised under his feet, and death itself swallowed up in victory. The eternal God hath already prepared his throne for judgment : He will certainly execute judgment in righteousness and in faithfulness ; and then every iniquitous sentence will be reversed, and every oppressor punished. In the mean while all who know his name, will trust him for temporal protection and eternal salvation ; and their experience will daily increase their knowledge and confirm their faith ; for the Lord never did, and never will, forsake or reject any who seek his favour according to his word. He is "is Christ

"reconciling the world unto himself ;" he may be found upon a mercy-seat : let saints then sing praises to him, and call upon sinners to come and trust in him. The blood of many martyrs has been shed, and their persecutors have supposed that no inquisition would be made for it : but from time to time the Lord anticipates that day, when "the earth shall disclose her blood, and shall no more cover her slain." He is ever mindful of the cry of the humble. His consolations more than counterbalance outward afflictions, and if any are cut off by martyrdom, their souls are forwarded to heaven. There the church is triumphant : here it must be militant. Satan, who hates us, will stir up opposition and excite our depravity by his suggestions ; but the Lord, who hath lifted us up from the gates of death and hell, considers all our conflicts and temptations ; he will give us merciful deliverances on earth, that we may praise him with his people ; and in a little time will completely rescue our souls, that in his temple above, we may rejoice in his salvation and triumph in his praise. Then the wicked of every description will sink into the pit of destruction : their own crimes will fall upon them, and they will be caught in their own snare : then especially, will the power and justice of God be made known to all the world, by the judgments that he executeth ; and even whole nations of those who forgot and despised him, shall be turned into hell, and for ever shut up in that region of darkness and despair. Many of his people are here permitted to be poor and afflicted, and seem to be forgotten ; and they are all poor in spirit, and have nothing to trust to but his mercy and grace. But they shall not always be forgotten : their expectation of help and salvation from God shall not perish in disappointment for ever. Often it hath seemed as if man would prevail against the cause of God : but the church has prayed, and her Advocate has pleaded, and the arm of the Lord has been extended ; some of her enemies have been judged and have perished, others have been intimidated, and others humbled in cordial submission : so that the cause of God yet maintains its ground. Yet still we have abundant reason to unite in prayer, and to say, ' Arise, O Lord, let not Satan, or man, prevail to confine thy church within such narrow limits, to corrupt it by so many heresies and scandals, or to distract it with so many divisions and disputes : put those in fear, and to shame, who arrogate more to themselves than can belong to fallible, sinful mortal man ; humble and convert every opposer, and destroy every system of superstition and delusion : that all the inhabitants of the earth may know themselves to be lost, sinful men, gladly welcome the Saviour, and become his willing subjects. Higgaion. Selah. Amen.'

V. 14, 15. Though the Lord did not immediately appear to punish the persecutors, the Psalmist was fully assured that he observed with strict attention all the mischief and malice, that was shown; and would by his power openly requite his enemies. In confidence of this, his poor and persecuted servants left themselves in his hands, as destitute orphans who had no other helper, but who were assured of his compassionate protection. They also prayed against their oppressor, that God would break his arm, (or deprive him of power,) and search out, in order to terminate, his wickedness. This verse is in the imperative mood.

V. 16. The Canaanites had been destroyed out of the land by the power of JEHOVAH, the eternal King of Israel; and Saul and his adherents were in reality no less heathen than they: David therefore in faith expected their extirpation from among the people of God. The original words, rendered for ever and ever, appear always strictly to denote eternity.

V. 17, 18. The encouragement to be derived from the readiness, which God had ever shown, to answer the prayers of the humble; the reason of this condescension to them in particular, because their prayers sprang from hearts prepared by his special grace; the pleasure, so to speak, which he took in listening to them; and the deliverances in consequence granted to his church by crushing worldly oppressors, are circumstances replete with instruction and encouragement.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

As every believer, and the whole church, in conformity to Christ, must have seasons of trial and humiliation: the tempter and his party for a time succeeds; and the Lord will sometimes seem to stand at a distance when his help is most wanted. But this will lead the believer to humble faith and prayer, and tend to his good; and he should remember that the Saviour once exclaimed, "My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?" For it is far better to be a tempted, persecuted, and deserted saint, than a prosperous persecutor. It is a sad mark of a reprobate mind, when men glory in those desires and practices which are really shameful. Nothing is more hateful to God, more contrary to true religion, or more prolific of other crimes, than covetousness: Yet many who are severe against sins of inferior malignity, favour and speak well of the covetous; too often, it is to be feared, from covetousness in themselves. But persecutors are most liable to this: the tools that they employ, being generally such as sell their souls, and as would, if they had the opportunity, sell Christ himself for filthy lucre's sake. Pride, however, is especially the image of Satan and the root of apostacy; and where it prevails, it will appear even in a man's looks. The proud man scorns dependence, or subjection to any Lord; he feels no want of a Teacher, a Priest, or a Saviour; he excuses or vindicates his transgressions of God's law; he abhors the humbling truths of his gospel; and he is more disposed to rival God, or rob him of his glory, than to render him the worship and obedience which he demands. He therefore banishes from his mind all thoughts of him as much as he can. From such ungodliness, iniquity and fraud must spring of course; except as restrained by the fear of man or by contrary lusts. And when a man of this character obtains power and authority, he is formed for a tyrant and a persecutor. God's judgments are not feared or thought of; human opposition is disdained and derided. Grievous oppressions conducted with perjuries, deceit, lies, and all kinds of abominable words and actions, may be expected, as circumstances arise and occasion requires. From this source a great part of that enmity and contempt, which infidels express against the inoffensive disciples of Christ, without doubt, originates. Full of self-conceit, they affect to be thought wiser, and are ambitious of being greater, than other men. They consider Christianity and its zealous friends as standing in their way; and in opposing them, they bring ruin on themselves.—Alas, how many in all ages have answered this character! And more have shown the disposition, who could not or dared not indulge it. Indeed all our deliberate sins spring from unbelief, forgetfulness, or contempt of God; and our hearts are prone to atheism itself. But the Lord beholds, and will requite the spite and malice, and all other crimes, which elude or out-brave human justice: he will judge in behalf of the fatherless and oppressed, against the worldly oppressor. Let then the poor, afflicted, persecuted, or tempted believer recollect, that Satan is by usurpation and human choice the prince of this world, and the father of all wicked men: and the children of God cannot reasonably expect much kindness, truth, or justice, from such persons as formerly crucified the Lord of glory. But this once-suffering Jesus, now reigns as king over all the earth, for the benefit of his church; and of his dominion there shall be no end. Let us then commit ourselves unto him. Let us humbly trust in his mercy, and beg of him to prepare our hearts for himself; for the desires which he imparts, he will regard and answer. He will rescue the believer from every temptation, and break the arm of every oppressor, and "bruise Satan under our feet shortly." When that enemy shall be chained, and cast into the bottomless pit, every antichrist shall be destroyed; oppression and persecution shall cease, and the nations shall learn war no more; for they shall become the kingdoms of our Lord Jesus, the Prince of peace. But from heaven alone, will all sin and temptation be excluded: no Canaanite shall

NOTES.

PSALM XI. V. 1—3. It is probable, that this psalm was composed, when David began to be in danger from the envy and malice of Saul: but after David came to the throne, it was given to the chief musician for the service of the sanctuary. Many suppose these verses to be the language of enemies, who wanted to discourage David's hope in God: but as the unprincipled wickedness of his persecutors is fairly allowed; it is more likely they contain the prudent advice of his timid friends; who advised him and his small party to flee from court to their mountain, (the pronoun is plural) to some place of safety pointed out to them, as the sparrow escapes from the fowler. They represented that malice and treachery were combined against him, and he would soon be slain, as by an arrow shot from an unknown hand; that all foundations of religion and justice were subverted; that the most upright conduct would rather endanger him, than do him any service; and that there was no good to be done by the most righteous persons in such circumstances: or, What is the righteous man doing, who expects safety in such a dangerous situation. But David considered the service of Saul and of Israel as his post of duty; and, trusting in the Lord, he would not listen to temptations at present to desert it.

V. 4, 5. In the subsequent part of the psalm, David shows the reasons of his confidence. JEHOVAH, as dwelling in his sanctuary, and manifesting his glory from the mercy-seat, was the God of Israel; the reconciled Friend of his people: but his throne was fixed in heaven, far above the power and machinations of all earthly potentates. —His omniscience, perfectly viewing the character of every man, and his perfect justice, concurred in detecting and punishing wicked persecutors and oppressors, who were the objects of his holy detestation: and though he tried and proved the righteous, by sharp afflictions; yet the event would certainly be favourable to them.

V. 6. The language of this verse is evidently taken from the awful judgment of God on Sodom and Gomorrah, which were destroyed by fire and brimstone from heaven. Thus at last the wicked, ensnared in their own counsels, and driven away by the wrath of God, as a tremendous tempest, will receive their portion in the lake which burneth with fire and brimstone. This is the cup of vengeance which will be given them to drink; seeing they have rejected the cup of salvation.

V. 7. 'He who is in himself essential righteousness, cannot but love his own resemblance wrought in the faithful by his good Spirit: with a countenance full of parental affection, he beholds and speaks peace and comfort to them, in the midst of their sorrows, until admitted, through mercy, to that glory from which justice excludes the wicked, and beholding that countenance which has always beheld them, they shall enter on a life of boundless and everlasting felicity.' (Horne.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The servant of God should abide in his place and at his work, though it expose him to many dangers and difficulties: and the honour of God, the interests of his people, and regard to consistency of character, require eminent persons to expose themselves more in times of persecution, than their inferiors are called to do. But the believer, when not terrified by the power and rage of his enemies; will frequently be tempted to desert his post, or to neglect his work, by the fears of his friends. They will clearly see his danger; but, through want or weakness of faith, they will not perceive his security; and they will often give him counsel that savours of worldly policy rather than of heavenly wisdom. But such dangerous temptations must be rejected with firmness and decision. Let it not be thought that, in times of prevailing iniquity, when all regard to the laws of God and man is discarded, the righteous can do no good. 'All is not over, while there is a man left to reprove error, and bear testimony to the truth; and a man who does this with a becoming spirit, may stop a prince, or senate, when in full career, and re-cover the day.'—'No place on earth is out of the reach of care and trouble. Temptations are every where; and so is the grace of God.' (Horne.) The upright and zealous servants of God are indeed peculiarly exposed to the malice of wicked persecutors, who commonly have power on their side: but let us not forget the almighty God. Upon his mercy-seat he hears the prayers and defends the cause of his people: but into that holy temple the daring sinner hath no access. On his exalted throne he ruleth over all the kings of the earth; he notices all the devices of his enemies, and the perils of his friends: he will permit the persecutor to proceed as far as is requisite, to prove and increase the faith and holiness of his servants. But he abhorreth those who delight in cruelty and violence, and will shortly assign them their horrible portion in the pit of destruction. He loveth his own image in his people: he beholds them with complacency and paternal care: he protects their lives till their work is done, and then receives them to his heavenly kingdom. And what hath he to fear who hath a righteous cause, an almighty Friend, and a faithful promise on his side?

NOTES.

PSALM XII. V. 1—4. This psalm may be supposed to have been written towards the end of Saul's reign; when his impiety and abuse of authority had given such a sanction to vice and ungodliness, that not only piety, but truth and honesty, seemed about to expire, while every kind of wickedness was practised without fear or shame. Dissimulation, flattery, profane and arrogant boastings, treachery, and calumny, were the general recommendations of the superior people in Israel, to the favour of their king and his courtiers; and the infection spread rapidly among all orders of men. Forgetting to whom they were indebted for the gift of speech, and for what purpose it was given, and of their accountableness to God; they considered their tongues as their own, to be employed as they pleased; they thought to carry all before them by their wit, eloquence, or calumnies. But in fact they were only exposing themselves to the judgments of God against flatterers and proud boasters.

V. 5, 6. For the comfort of the remnant of poor and persecuted believers, David addressed them in his prophetic character. The Lord assured them, that he noticed their oppressions, and regarded their sighs and sorrows; and that He was about to arise to punish their enemies, and set them in safety from the power, and the cruel sarcasms and menaces to which they were exposed. And the Psalmist reminded them that they might confidently depend on this assurance; for the words, (or oracles,) of God formed a perfect contrast to the deceitful and iniquitous speeches of their neighbours. His testimonies and promises had often been tried by his servants during the sharpest distresses, and had always been found sincere and faithful: and every one of his words was holy, just, good and inestimably precious: like silver, which has been many times refined, in the most perfect manner, from all remaining alloy. The death of Saul, the ruin of his party, and the advancement of David to the throne a short time after this, formed an exact fulfilment of this prediction.

V. 7. The Septuagint renders this verse as follows, 'Thou, Lord, wilt guard us, and preserve us from this generation, and for ever.' Not only from this wicked race, but "from every evil work unto thy heavenly kingdom." (2 Tim. iv. 18.)

V. 8. When such vile men as Doeg and his party were advanced to great authority, the wicked were emboldened to show themselves, and encouraged openly to avow their corrupt principles, and practise every kind of iniquity. But when the power should be put into other tresses, he became confident, that he should soon rejoice in God, as delivered and comforted by him; and celebrate in glad songs of praise the gracious interposition of the Lord in his behalf.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The most eminent believers are sometimes left to great discouragement; either for the chastisement of their sins, or the trial of their faith. When former comforts are suspended, and a sense or fear of divine wrath unites with an accusing conscience; when temptations stir up the corruptions of the heart, and they can find no deliverance from the painful conflict: they may be led to suspect, that their past experience was a delusion, and to fear that the Lord intends to cast them off for ever. At such times their fervent expostulations with God will be tinged by unbelieving fears. They cannot bear that their beloved should seem to forget them; they are tormented at the thought of final separation from him; they are wretched under the suspension of his comforts; and they cannot but anxiously inquire, "how long" this painful trial is to last? And whether it must be for ever? They inwardly take counsel about ascertaining the state of their souls, discovering the cause of their troubles, or devising how to obtain deliverance: but all seems in vain; and every day appears an age, whilst continual sorrow oppresses their hearts: and they are ready to trouble themselves with the idea, how Satan and their other enemies are triumphing in their fallen state. But all this is intended for their humiliation; that they may search out and repent of their sins, renounce every false confidence and worldly idol, and be made more fervent in prayer. They will not then say, "There is no hope;" but after His example, "who being in an agony, prayed more earnestly," they will call upon God to consider their trouble, and to lighten their eyes; to confirm their hope, direct their path, and renew their comforts; that they may not lie down in darkness and despair: they will plead with him the triumphs of the ungodly and of Satan, if they should be left under the power of sin, in despondency, or to perish: and surely it cannot be for his glory, that his worshippers should be insulted over by his enemies! In this way they will pour out their prayers, renouncing all confidence, save in the mercy of their God through the Saviour's blood: and sometimes suddenly, at others gradually, they will find their burdens removed and their comforts restored. Believing, they then rejoice in his salvation, and their doleful complaints are changed for songs of praise and thanksgiving. But even though long delays take place, yet they who trust in the Lord's mercy, shall at length rejoice in his salvation; they shall

And it may be of use to the tempted and discouraged believer to recollect, that the Saviour, soon after his doleful complaint, "My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?" subjoined, "It is finished," and "Father, into thy hand I commend my spirit:" and that the depth of his humiliation immediately preceded the dawn of his glorious exaltation.

NOTES.

PSALM XIV. V. 1. This psalm is thought to have been written on occasion of Absalom's rebellion, and the people's defection from their aged and pious king; and the mention of Zion, as the place whence salvation was to come, shows that it was composed some time after David came to the kingdom over all Israel. From the degeneracy of Israel shown in that instance, the Psalmist takes occasion to lament the general depravity of human nature: and the psalm is almost entirely the same as the fifty-third. The word fool in Scripture, denotes one who not only is destitute of true wisdom, but hates it, the openly ungodly and wicked man. (Marg. Ref.) Persons of this description "like not to retain God in their knowledge," and therefore "say in their hearts, no God." Averse to obedience and submission to the authority of any superior, and even to the thoughts of an omnipotent, ever present, heart-searching and righteous Governor and Judge; and disliking his spiritual worship and holy law; they secretly wish that there were no God; they try to hope there is none; they seek for arguments and objections against his existence, perfections, or authority; they try to believe what they wish to be true, and by the aid of Satan, through the just judgment of God, they in a measure succeed. In order, however, to exclude troublesome misgivings, and to strengthen their cause, they propagate these absurdities and endeavour to make proselytes. This is the real history of the rise and progress of atheism, that deepest stigma of human nature. Man having done abominable works, being conscious of guilt, and bent on further transgression, expects nothing but wrath from God, and so runs into atheism for a shelter from terror and alarm: unless idolatry, or some species of false religion, can be rendered equally efficacious in quieting the conscience and giving encouragement in sin. And as speculative atheism is the offspring of a depraved heart and vicious life; it also tends to the increase of wickedness; till the fatal infection spreads, and produces general degeneracy and profligacy.

Judge could not find one of the children of men, who understood his obligations, duty, and interest, or that sought the favour and glory of the Lord. All are turned aside from the right way, into different ways of disobedience: all are become filthy, corrupt, and putrid or loathsome, in his sight; not one can be found disposed to do that which is spiritually good.—This must be understood of man left to himself, man as he is by nature without regeneration: and St. Paul quotes the passage to prove the need both Jews and Gentiles have of redemption and salvation by grace, and through faith in Christ. Between this verse and that which follows, three verses are inserted in the version used in the common Prayer Book, which are taken from some copies of the Septuagint: for in other copies they are not found, any more than in the Hebrew, or Syriac. The Apostle in the third chapter of Romans, has the same verses, and it is evident that he selected them from several parts of the Old Testament, especially from the fifth, thirty-sixth, and one hundred and fortieth Psalms, and the fifty-ninth chapter of Isaiah: and it is probable, that some transcriber of the Septuagint inserted those verses from that remarkable passage of the Apostle.

V. 4—6. Every kind of wickedness will in the event be found contrary to common sense and prudence. But they who persecute God's worshippers with greediness and delight, and refuse to ask any mercy or favour from him, do in effect set him at defiance, which is the height of madness and folly. Yet when they would cast off the fear of God, they become slaves to various terrors; and often add one crime to another, for fear of offending their fellow-creatures, or to avoid the consequences of their former misconduct. Whereas God dwelleth amongst the righteous, to protect them from dangers and alarms. The Psalmist having stated these general principles, remonstrates with his insulting enemies, for deriding the counsel of the poor believer, who maketh the Lord his refuge: when their own inward terrors evinced, that they could not find security and comfort elsewhere.

V. 7. The more fully and deeply David experienced and witnessed the depravity of man, and the disposition of Israel to apostatize; the more fervently he longed and prayed for the salvation of Israel by the power and favour of JEHOVAH, who was worshipped on mount Zion: by this it is reasonable to suppose, that he did not merely intend Israel's deliverance from bondage, or subjection to foreign enemies, or to domestic usurpers: or of his own restoration to the throne, and return to the courts of God; but especially of the proposed kingdom and salvation of the Messiah, the deliverance of his people from the bondage of Satan, to the liberty of God's service, with all its glorious and joyful effects.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

All the wickedness of men's words and actions springs from the corrupt fountain of their hearts: and if the thoughts of ungodly men were detected and published, (as they will be at the day of judgment,) how vile would they appear! Infidelity and iniquity have a reciprocal influence on each other; and are progressive, till men's foolish hearts become darkened, and atheism is conceived and promulgated. Men differ in their peculiar propensities and outward characters: but they are all naturally carnal, alienated from God, destitute of true wisdom, incapable of things spiritually good, gone aside from the right way, and corrupt in their desires and imaginations: and therefore all would have gone further and sunk deeper in abominable works continually and eternally, if it had not been for the inestimable redemption of Jesus Christ. We should be thankful, if we have been restrained from the more destructive excesses into which so many are hurried: but we ought not to rest in any thing short of union with Christ, and a new creation unto holiness by his spirit. If we have experienced this blessed change, let us give the Lord all the glory; and let us pity and pray for our fellow-sinners. The enmity of the human heart against God, not only appears from man's proud aversion to call upon his name; but from the delight, which in all ages men have taken in persecuting his inoffensive people: but all who engage in this attempt, will prove their own folly: and the terrors, to which they have often been exposed, evince that they do violence to the light of their own consciences. However the poor believer may be derided for his confidence in God, he has obtained such a refuge from every danger and enemy, as shall never make him ashamed: for God himself dwells among the righteous, and is their protector in every generation. All our acquaintance with the depravity of human nature, should endear to us "salvation out of Zion:" and whilst we rejoice in the earnest, and are waiting for the completion, of our own salvation, we should

A Psalm of David.

LORD, * who shall * abide in thy tabernacle? Who shall dwell in ^b thy holy hill?

2. He that walketh uprightly, and worketh righteousness, and ^e speaketh the truth in his heart.

NOTES.

PSALM XV. V. 1. It is probable, that as soon as the ark was stationed on mount Zion, the Psalmist addressed himself to God, desirous of being taught who would be the accepted and persevering worshipper at his tabernacle. This was typical of the true church of God on earth; all the members of which are heirs also of heaven. The inquiry, therefore, is virtually, Who is he that so worshippeth God in this world, as to have a well grounded hope of eternal life hereafter? It is not inquired, what are the grounds of a sinner's acceptance with God? On this subject we are fully instructed in other parts of Scripture. But what are the characteristic marks of those who are thus accepted, by which they may be distinguished from all other persons? And the answer evidently is, (in perfect consistency with the New Testament, and especially with St. John's first epistle;) 'They may be distinguished by their sanctification.' Thus believers are conformed in their measure to Christ, their perfect exemplar: and the character here given of them forms a beautiful contrast to that of ungodly men, as delineated in the preceding psalm. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 2, 3. "The fruits meet for repentance;" "the work of faith, and labour of love, and patience of hope," "the fruits of the Spirit," and "the things which accompany salvation," are here compendiously enumerated, or rather pointed out, in some of the most striking and observable particulars.

V. 4. "The vile person" is an openly wicked and ungodly man. Persons of this description may be exalted in station, and abound in wealth, and many will pay court to them: but the true servant of God will form a juster estimate of their character and state. He will neither envy their prosperity, nor give any sanction to their impiety. If they be magistrates, he will honour them, as the ministers of God in this official character; in other respects, he will express compassion for their misery, but a marked disapprobation of their wickedness. (Marg. Ref.) In the common prayer-book, this clause is rendered 'He that sitteth not by himself, but is lowly in his own eyes:' and this sense may be implied, though not the immediate meaning of the passage. The Septuagint render the last clause, "He that sweareth to his neighbour, "and changeth not;" and this in fact seems the most obvious meaning of the words. The doctrine of our translation is undoubtedly implied; yet it is not easily made out from the original.

V. 5. The concluding clause of this verse, in the original, is emphatical. "He that doeth these things shall not be moved for ever," or to eternity. The formal, nay, plausible, worshippers at the tabernacle; the descendants of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob; and the most zealous contenders for the law, might be moved from their steadfastness, and perish: but none would be moved for ever, or come short of eternal life, who really bore the character here delineated. (1 John ii. 19.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

We should all, with hearts devoutly lifted up to God in prayer, inquire who they are that so walk with him in his ordinances and commandments, as to possess a well-grounded assurance of dwelling with him in heaven for ever. If we would ascend after our risen Saviour to that holy habitation, we must copy his example; for "without holiness no man shall see the Lord." This will both evidence our title to the inheritance of the saints in light, and prepare us for that blessed inheritance. If we are born again, and led by the Spirit of Christ, we shall bring forth the fruits of the Spirit, in all goodness, righteousness, and truth. Unfeigned piety; constant and conscientious integrity in all our dealings; sincerity and fidelity in all our professions and engagements; an abhorrence of slander in all its hateful forms; a carefulness not to injure any man, in body or soul, in his connexions, property, reputation, or peace; a mind deeply humbled before God in self-abasement for sin, yet superior to flattering or fawning on wicked men from selfish motives, and disposed to love and honour God's image in the poorest and meanest of his people; a willingness to recede from every personal advantage rather than seem to do evil, with a determination to adhere scrupulously to duty and conscience; a disposition to keep at the utmost distance from oppression and injustice, and to cultivate humanity and benevolence to the poor and afflicted; an union of all these tempers and this habitual conduct, can only spring from repentance of sin, faith in the Saviour, and love to his name and cause; and therefore they form an unequivocal proof of our acceptance in him. The man who bears this character cannot be induced to apostacy; he cannot come short of glory. "He that doeth these things shall not be moved to eternity." In these respects let us examine and prove our own selves: knowing that the image of Christ is thus, in some measure, formed in us, except we be reprobates.

NOTES.

PSALM XVI. Michtam. This word signifies golden; and this title is supposed to intimate, that the psalm is upon a most precious subject: accordingly it is quoted by two apostles as a prophecy of Christ; and the language of it towards the close can suit no other person. (Marg. Ref.) Yet it is probable that David began his meditation with reference to his own case: but he was carried out beyond himself to use expressions prophetic of the Messiah; and indeed he seems to have known, that the holy Spirit intended much greater things than any of his personal concerns.

V. 2, 3. While the Psalmist most solemnly avouched JEHOVAH for his God, and owned him as his Governor and Judge; he disclaimed all merit in his services, and ascribed all his goodness and the honour of it to God. His good works could not profit the Source of all happiness: yet they might be useful to the saints, in whom, as the most excellent persons on earth, and as especially beloved by the Lord, the psalmist delighted. "If thou wilt protect me I will employ all my power, when I come to the throne, to protect the pious; worthy men shall be preferred and honoured; for they are persons who are most dear to me, and in whose company I delight." can add nothing to the essential glory and happiness of the Father; but it is the meritorious cause of the acceptance and sanctification and eternal felicity of his people, in whom he greatly delighteth.

V. 4. It is the opinion of learned men, that this psalm was composed when David lived among the Philistines: and when, perhaps, some of his associates were strongly tempted to join the idolatrous worship which they continually witnessed. But he showed them, that this would certainly bring on them additional miseries by the just judgment of God. And, (perhaps adverting to Joshua's resolution; "As for me and my house we will serve the LORD;") he avowed his determination to have no communion in such abominations, and not so much as to mention the names of their detestable idols. We do not read of drink-offerings of blood in any other place. Either it was customary among the idolaters to taste the blood of the victims, (which were often human victims) before it was poured out in honour of the idol; or they poured the blood, as the Israelites did wine, for a libation, on the sacrifice when burning on the altar: or else the wine used in idolatrous sacrifices was as abominable to God, as if the blood itself had been drunk; which being the atonement for sin, was expressly prohibited to be tasted by the Israelites. Even the sacrifices at the sanctuary of God at length became an abomination to those who rejected Christ, and hastened after others who professed to be the promised Messiah.

V. 5, 6. The Lord was David's present comfort, a source of exultation and refreshment, as the cup of water to the thirsty, or of wine to the intemperate: he was also his future inheritance; and he who allotted him his portion would maintain him in it, and never leave him to forfeit it. As Canaan was divided by lot and line, these metaphors are used to represent his joy in the favour of God: but the Saviour himself has obtained the most goodly heritage; and his people are admitted to partake of it.

V. 7. The Psalmist's meditation, experience, and chastisement; and the immediate communications of wisdom and knowledge which he received, during his midnight reflections and devotions, concurred with outward instructions, in counselling him, and teaching him to act with prudence and caution in his difficult circumstances. They likewise combined in confirming him to choose God for his Portion. In the dark season of adversity and affliction, and when chastened with painful sickness; as well as in the silent hours of the night, heavenly wisdom was communicated to him.—The reins or kidneys, were considered by the Israelites, as especially affected by whatever caused uneasiness or satisfaction; nay, they are often spoken of as if the seat of reflection and the secret purposes of the soul. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 8—11. David might perhaps have some regard to his own hope and experience in these verses: but doubtless Christ was especially intended.—As man, he relied on the power, truth, love, and promise of the Father: therefore he was not moved in his deepest sufferings; but “for the joy that was set before him endured the cross, and despised the shame.” He willingly yielded to death, assured that his human soul should not be left in the place of separate spirits, nor his body in the grave till it began to corrupt: but that he should arise on the third day, and afterwards ascend to heaven, as the First-fruits of the Resurrection, and the fore-runner of his people. Thus was he shown, and showed to them, the path of life; and the way into the presence of God, where is fulness of joy: and he is seated at the right hand of the Father, where are pleasures, for him and for his people, for evermore.—Many learned men interpret the two clauses of the tenth verse to mean exactly the same thing, referring both of them to the body of Christ, laid in the grave, and raised before it saw corruption: but as the article in the very ancient form called the Apostles’ creed, (though doubtless of something later date;) grounds on this expression, and the application of it, the article concerning Christ’s descending into hell; it is evident, that the compilers of it supposed something further than being buried to be intended. And the original (as well as the Greek translation, quoted verbatim in the Acts of the Apostles,) favours the idea of a distinct meaning in each clause. The Hebrew word Sheol and the Greek Hades, by which it is constantly rendered, both seem to denote the state of man when no longer seen on earth. “When spoken of the body, they signify the grave—when of the soul they refer to that state in which the soul is without the body, whether Paradise or Hell,” (properly so called.) (Grotius; Usher.) The human nature of Christ consisted of body and soul; his soul was, during the space between his death and his resurrection, as certainly in the place of separate spirits, as his body was in the grave: but when he arose, they were both called forth and reunited. These words are never used, but with respect to men between death and the resurrection: and never concerning angels, or the state of men after the resurrection. But they are applied, both with respect to the grave and the place of separation to good and to bad men, without much discrimination: and the representation given in the parable of the rich man and Lazarus, seems to place Lazarus as well as the rich man, in Hades; but in another division of it. Thus the pagans placed their Elysium adjacent to Tartarus, as two parts in the same region of the dead.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

Our Lord and Saviour hath shown us by his example how to overcome temptations, and to be preserved through trials: we must trust in God and pour out our prayers before him, as in Christ reconciled to every believer. But we must also remember continually, that all good comes from God, to whom the whole glory appertains: and that the most perfect obedience of his noblest creatures cannot render him their debtor, or add to his felicity. What then are our defective and polluted services! Yet when from our heart we avouch the God of heaven for our Lord, we should for his sake do good to his people: and if we account them to be, as they really are, the excellent of the earth, and delight in them and in their prosperity; we may, after his example in a subordinate degree, be very useful to them. And as our righteousness and salvation were the purchase of his blood; we should not be reluctant to deny ourselves, to labour, or to suffer for that purpose. Not only they who seek after other gods, but they who worship other mediators, and invent other methods of salvation than that revealed in the Scripture, are hastening to multiply their own sorrows: God abhors their most pompous and expensive superstition and services; our great High Priest will not present such sacrifices, nor mention the names of such worshippers in his continual intercession: and Christians should carefully avoid all fellowship with anti-christian delusions. They need not have recourse to these vain expedients, any more than to worldly vanities: for the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ is their God and Father in him: their present Comforter and their all-sufficient and eternal Portion; and he will maintain their lot, as well as that of their Surety, in defiance of the united power and policy of earth and hell. The poorest believer may therefore triumphantly say, “The lines are fallen unto me in pleasant places; yea, I have a goodly heritage.” (Rom. viii.) What thanks then are due to Him, who hath counselled us to make this happy choice; who hath taught us to profit by our daily experience, and to find comfort in him in the hours of solitude, and in seasons of affliction! He who has learned to set God before him, to act as in his presence, and to rely on his watchful care and protection, may be sharply tried and tempted; but he cannot be moved; for the power, which upheld the Saviour, is engaged on his side. Whilst our hearts rejoice in such blessings, let us use our tongues, as indeed the glory of our nature, in celebrating the praises of our God: whilst too many are proving their tongues to be “unruly evils full of deadly poison.” And as the Saviour, the Holy One of God, saw not corruption, but arose the First-fruits of them that slept, and ascended into heaven to open the paths of life and salvation: so the believer need neither fear, lest his soul should be left to perish, nor his body in the grave: but his flesh too may rest in hope; for though it see corruption, it shall be raised again incorruptible; and both body and soul shall be shown the path of life, and admitted into God’s presence, where there is fulness of joy, and to his right hand, where there are pleasures for evermore. Wherefore let us comfort ourselves and each other, with these words.

PSALM XVII.

David appeals to God for his integrity,

NOTES.

PSALM XVII. Title. The inscription often found at the beginning of these sacred hymns, (viz. “A psalm of David,”) may literally be rendered “A psalm to David,” and thence some have been led to think that he did not write all, or even most, of them. But at the head of this psalm the same mode of expression is used; and consequently, if those psalms were not composed by him, but only addressed to him, this psalm would be entitled “A prayer to David.” This shows that our version is so far right; that the translation is of the same import with the original, and means A Psalm, ascribed to David, as its author; though in a few instances, perhaps, without sufficient reason.

V. 1—3. We shall not fully enter into the spirit of this psalm, unless we place ourselves in the circumstances of David. The whole tenour of it shows that he has given us his earnest meditation and prayer, at the most interesting crisis, when Saul, instigated by groundless suspicions and false accusations, and pursuing him as a traitor, had surrounded him with his troops, and must have seized on him, had not God most wonderfully interposed. (Marg. Ref.) The persecuted and slandered servant of God, in this extremity, appealed to his omnipotent Lord: and conscious that he had in no respect deserved ill of his cruel enemy, he called upon God to hear justice, and to accept his prayer, which was not the language of deceit respecting men, or hypocrisy towards God. He besought him to pronounce sentence between him and Saul, according to his intimate acquaintance with the cause; as he knew that equity was on his side: for the Lord had long proved the heart of his servant; he had seen his conduct and thought’s, even at midnight, when traitors either meet to form their plans, or meditate how to carry them into execution. Indeed circumstances had served to try him as by fire; seeing he had had several opportunities of avenging himself. Yet God was witness, that nothing of this kind had been thought of by him: nay, the Psalmist had avoided every disrespectful word concerning Saul, the Lord’s anointed; lest he should excite his followers to attempt aught against him.

V. 4, 5. “The works of men,” (of Adam, or his fallen nature in all his descendants,) are those works to which they are propense; and among others, they have a strong propensity to “render evil for evil:” but David had so studied the oracles of God, that by regarding his promises and precepts, he had resisted every temptation to this conduct. The word rendered destroyer, signifies a robber or murderer: but the Psalmist seems not so much to have intended, that he had kept himself out of the reach of those who wished to murder him, or from the ways of Satan, the destroyer; as that he had been kept from embracing any of the inviting opportunities afforded him of killing Saul. And he still prayed that he might be upheld, and not left to fall into so great a crime, however injured and tempted. In the present circumstances of human nature, the ways of godliness are become slippery paths, through the artifices of Satan, and the snares of the world. In some of these things David may be considered as a type of Christ ; who alone was universally and perfectly free from sin, and could say in the fullest sense, that a heart-searching God could find nothing wrong in him.

V. 8. Apple. The singular precaution with which the Creator has secured the pupil of the eye, and by which every creature instinctively guards it from injury ; forms a striking illustration of the Lord's watchful care over his people, amidst the peculiar dangers to which they are on every side exposed. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 10. David's persecutors were prosperous, self-indulgent, and luxurious ; and thus they grew arrogant, impious, unfeeling, and presumptuous.

V. 11, 12. ' Indeed they have now gotten me and my followers into a very great strait, and which way soever we turn ourselves, we are in danger to fall into the hands of those who have steadfastly resolved on our utter ruin.' — ' No lion can be more desirous to tear a lamb in pieces, than Saul is to make a prey of me.' (Bp. Patrick.) He and his associates likewise acted with dark subtlety, and seemed to be thinking of something else, when they were watching their opportunity of mischief and murder.

V. 13-15. In this extremity, unless the Lord speedily interposed, (as one who had delayed till no more time could be lost,) to prevent Saul from accomplishing his wicked design, and to disappoint him of his prey by some humiliating event ; he would certainly take away David's life, and so render the promises of God of no effect. Saul and his men had been as the sword and hand of God, by which he executed vengeance on many, and corrected others, in Israel : but they were mere mortal men of a worldly spirit, who preferred an earthly portion to the favour of God, and consequently had their good things in this life. God indeed gave them abundance of those treasures, which are commonly hidden for security and spent in self-indulgence : their children also were full, or had enough, and left their superfluity to their descendants. But would God suffer his servant to be destroyed by such profane selfish men ? The Psalmist, however, determined, whatever might be the event, to act as in the immediate presence of God, to maintain a good conscience, and to walk before God in righteousness ; and then, whether he died soon, or lived many years, he should certainly at last obtain full satisfaction, when he awaked in the eternal world, or at the general resurrection, perfectly renewed to the divine image in righteousness and true holiness. The former clause of the last verse, is here interpreted of David's purpose, and only the latter of his prospect. Some explain both to mean his expectation of happiness in the eternal world ; yet not excluding his hope of deliverance from his urgent dangers. — The Septuagint render the last clause, " I shall be satisfied in beholding thy glory."

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

Believers must follow their Saviour in the way, by which he passed through this world to glory ; and such men as were his enemies will be their's also ; but he was more hated, insulted, and cruelly entreated, than any of his followers ever were. They cannot, like Jesus, plead sinless perfection in any part or action of their lives : but through his merits and grace they may rejoice in the testimony of their conscience to their simplicity and godly sincerity. They have therefore right on their side, when oppressed or tempted : their own hearts do not condemn them of hypocrisy, and therefore they have confidence before a just and merciful God ; their prayers are not the language of dissembling lips, but the fervent desires of their hearts, and they may expect that he will give sentence in their behalf, when they are slandered and injured ; even such an equal sentence as must proceed from the presence of a holy God. Unallowed evil, felt and mourned over, should in no wise weaken this confidence : but without conscious integrity in our conduct towards God and man, such appeals would be the most impious presumption. The Lord seeth us in secret, visiteth us in the night, and witnesseth our conduct in our most secret retirement, when solitude tempts the hypocrite to sin, and when the imagination is apt to roam after forbidden objects : and if he find one indulged and allowed iniquity, he will abhor our feigned devotions. We should therefore purpose not to offend with our lips, or even in our hearts. We must not conform to the works of men, if we would escape the paths of the destroyer; “for broad is the way that leadeth to destruction, and many there be that go in thereat.” We must treasure up the precepts and promises of God’s word in our hearts, for our direction and encouragement; and pray continually to be upheld by his grace, if we would walk in the paths of holiness; for our way through this evil world is very slippery, and we are weak, and apt to be heedless; and our own watchfulness or resolutions, and former upright and consistent behaviour, cannot safely be depended on. But the Lord will incline his ear to those who call upon him: he hath always shown marvellous loving-kindness to such as have trusted in him; upholding and defending them by his right hand from all their enemies; keeping them safer by his grace, than the pupil of the eye is kept by his providence; and with greater tenderness, than the hen gathereth her chickens under her wings. The profane, the sensual, and the proud, indeed, are at all times their enemies; yet they are not always left to take an active part against them: but Satan is their most deadly foe: he is destitute of fear and compassion, hardened in malice, and replete with subtlety; and concerning him we may pray in assured faith, “Arise, O Lord, disappoint him, and cast him down; deliver my soul from this wicked one.” He is indeed the sword, by which the Lord punishes his enemies, and scourges a guilty world; but his children shall not be given over to be a prey to him, nor to his instruments. The most afflicted Christian need not envy the most prosperous “men of the world, who have their portion in this life.” They indeed receive from the Lord that abundant treasure which they love to lay up securely for themselves; to spend in varied kinds of gratification, or hoard to aggrandize their families: and frequently the desires of their hearts in these matters are granted them. Yet they must die, and leave their good things behind them to enter another world, where they have no portion, but darkness and despair. But the believer walks here in the light of God’s countenance, in a delightful attendance on his ordinances and obedience to his commands: he rejoices in the hope of glory: when he dies, his soul departs hence “to be with Christ which is far better;” and at the resurrection his body shall be raised incorruptible and glorious; and being completely changed into the image of his God and Saviour, he shall be eternally and perfectly satisfied with a happiness, large as his desires and capacities. Lord, teach us to “choose this good part, which shall never be taken from us.”

NOTES.

PSALM XVIII. V. 1. This introductory verse is not found in the parallel passage in the second book of Samuel: (Notes, 2 Sam. xxii.) The variations between the two copies seem to have been principally poetical improvements of the style, as few of them materially alter the sense, and several evidently render the composition more elegant. Indeed the whole Psalm seems one of the most finished poetical compositions, extant in any language. The word, here rendered, I will love thee, is peculiarly emphatical; ‘I will love thee with my inmost soul,’ ‘with the most tender and fervent affections of my heart,’ ‘and all that is within me.’ The experience which the aged Psalmist had acquired, of the Lord’s faithfulness, power, and love, no doubt excited the lively exercises of admiring and adoring love, as well as gratitude. Some think that David spake, as in the person of the risen Redeemer, taking a retrospect of his sufferings and triumphs; and the words, in that view, convey a most interesting and animating reflection to the mind of true Christians.

V. 3. ‘As the psalm so evidently throughout is a thanksgiving for past deliverances, the verbs in this verse seem to require the same rendering, as that which is given to them below.’ (Horne.) That is, they should be rendered in the past and not the future tense. But perhaps the Psalmist meant to give the feelings and purposes of his heart, while struggling with his difficulties and overcoming them by faith, to which the event corresponded: for the words are plainly future; and a total disregard to the tense should not be supposed without evident necessity.

V. 4, 5. The word rendered sorrows in these verses, signifies cords or pangs, especially those of women in travail; and it is translated pangs in the Septuagint. And as St. Luke in recording the apostle Peter’s sermon on the day of Pentecost, uses the same word concerning Christ, in respect of his resurrection, where it does not

6 * In my distress I called upon the LORD, and cried unto my God: * he heard my voice out of his temple, and * my cry came before him, even into his ears.

7 Then * the earth shook and trembled; * the foundations also of the hills moved and were shaken, because he was wroth.

8 There * went up a smoke * out of his nostrils, and * fire out of his mouth devoured: coals were kindled by it.

9 * He bowed the heavens also, and came down: and * darkness was under his feet.

10 And * he rode upon a cherub, and did fly: yea, he did fly upon the wings of the wind.

11 He made darkness * his secret place; his pavilion round about him were dark waters, * and thick clouds of the skies.

12 * At the brightness that was before him his thick clouds passed, * hail-stones and coals of fire.

13 The LORD also * thundered in the heavens, and * the Highest gave his voice; hail-stones and * coals of fire.

14 Yea, * he sent out his arrows, and scattered them; and * he shot out lightnings, and discomfited them.

15 Then * the channels of waters were seen, * and the foundations of the world were discovered, at thy rebuke, O LORD, * at the blast of the breath of thy nostrils.

16 * He sent from above, he took me, * he drew me out of * many waters:

17 He delivered me from * my strong enemy, and from * them which hated me: for * they were too strong for me.

18 They prevented me * in the day of my calamity, * but the LORD was my stay.

19 He brought me forth also * into a large place: he delivered me, * because he delighted in me.

20 The LORD * rewarded me according to my righteousness; * according to the cleanness of my hands hath he recompensed me.

21 For * I have kept the ways of the LORD, * and have not wickedly departed from my * God.

22 For * all his judgments were before me, * and I did not put away his statutes from me.

23 I was also * upright † before him, and * I kept myself from mine iniquity.

24 Therefore hath * the LORD recompensed me according to my righteousness, according to the cleanness of my hands † in his eye-sight.

25 * With the merciful thou wilt shew thyself merciful; with an upright man * thou wilt show thyself upright;

26 With the pure thou wilt shew thyself pure; and * with the froward thou wilt * shew thyself froward.

27 For thou wilt * save the afflicted people: but wilt * bring down high looks.

28 * He sent from above, he took me, * he drew me out of * many waters:

29 He delivered me from * my strong enemy, and from * them which hated me: for * they were too strong for me.

30 They prevented me * in the day of my calamity, * but the LORD was my stay.

31 He brought me forth also * into a large place: he delivered me, * because he delighted in me.

32 The LORD * rewarded me according to my righteousness; * according to the cleanness of my hands † in his eye-sight.

33 For * I have kept the ways of the LORD, * and have not wickedly departed from my * God.

34 For * all his judgments were before me, * and I did not put away his statutes from me.

35 I was also * upright † before him, and * I kept myself from mine iniquity.

seem so apposite as cords or bonds would have been; it is supposed, that he refers to the Septuagint version of this psalm; and that this is an additional proof that it should be considered chiefly as prophetic of his conflicts and triumphs. (Acts ii. 24.)

V. 6. This verse also is future in the original, (Note 3.) It varies from the parallel verse in Samuel, by using two nearly synonymous words for called and cried, while in the other copy the latter is merely a repetition of the former.

V. 7. The words "foundations of heaven," used in Samuel, are here changed for "foundations of the hills," or mountains. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 10. Two letters in the original, nearly alike, one used in Samuel, the other here, make the variation between the two copies: and probably it was originally a trivial error of a transcriber. In Samuel it is "He was seen upon the "wings of the wind."

V. 12. The brightness of JEHOVAH's appearance described. VOL. II.—No. 14.

persed the thick clouds, which preceded it. This clause is additional. The words "coals of fire kindled," are here changed for "hail-stones and coals of fire," which are also repeated in the next verse; and the marginal references show the propriety of the allusion contained in them.

V. 15. (Note, 2 Sam. xxii. 7—16.) As the grand imagery of this passage more aptly suits the resurrection and ascension of Christ, than any of David's deliverances; so it naturally leads the pious mind to reflect on the awful descriptions given us of the Saviour's last coming to judge the world.

V. 26. Shew thyself froward, or wrestle. The singular translation of this clause in Samuel, (to which no precise idea can well be affixed,) seems to have arisen from the translator's mistaking a contraction of a word signifying to struggle or wrestle, for a word derived from a root signifying insipid.

V. 27. The contrast between afflicted people and high looks. 4 H looks, shows that humility rather than suffering was intended, or rather humble sufferers.

V. 28, 29. Some apply the expression "Thou wilt," or dost, "light my candle," which had been extinguished, to the restoration of the Saviour from death, in which his body had lain as an extinguished taper: and the next verse to his bursting the barriers of the tomb.

V. 46-48. 'Thus we learn to trust in JEHOVAH 'without fear, when our enemies are victorious, and to 'glorify him without reserve, when we are so.' (Horne.)

V. 49. St. Paul quotes this verse as the language of the Messiah, to prove that the Gentiles would glorify God for his mercy. (Rom. xv. 9.) And this shows, beyond a doubt, that he considered the Psalm as prophetic of Christ: though it is not advisable to apply every clause to him, so as to overlook his ancestor and type, who seems to have been led by the Holy Spirit, from speaking of his own conflicts and deliverances, to use language which could never have its full accomplishment, but in his promised seed.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

In David the type, we may here behold Jesus our Redeemer, conflicting with enemies, compassed with sorrows and with floods of ungodly men, enduring not only the pains of death, but the wrath of God for us: yet calling upon the Father with strong cries and tears; rescued from the grave with a tremendous earthquake and various convulsions of nature: advanced to the mediatorial throne, and made head of the heathen, as a recompense of his most perfect obedience even unto death; executing vengeance on the Jewish nation, beating them as small as the dust before the wind, and casting them out, as the dirt in the streets; and proceeding either to reconcile, or to put under his feet all other enemies, till death the last enemy shall be destroyed. In the full assurance of these truths, and expectation of his appearing and his glory, we should hasten to submit willingly to his authority, and to embrace his salvation: we should trust in his merits, rejoice in his triumphs, and imitate his example. We too should most fervently love the Lord our Strength and our Salvation; we should call on him in every trouble, and praise him for every deliverance; we should aim to walk with him in all righteousness and true holiness, approving our hearts unto him, and keeping ourselves from our own iniquities. May he arm us for every conflict, and aid us in all: may we make no league with sin, nor give quarter to any lust. By his strength may we leap over every interposing wall of difficulty; by his light may we pass through every dark valley; till at length we share the Saviour's resurrection and ascension into heaven: for if we belong unto him, he conquered and reigns for us, and we shall conquer and reign through him; and partake of the mercy of our anointed King, which is entailed on all his seed for evermore.

NOTES.

PSALM XIX. V. 1. This Psalm seems especially to have been intended to prove, that the idolatry and irreligion of mankind were wholly inexcusable. Even the Gentiles, to the remotest regions of the earth, were shown the glory of God by the heavens and the heavenly orbs, the benefit of which they received; though they forgot the Creator: but Israel had fuller instructions from the sacred oracles.

V. 2. The day and night, in constant rotation, instruct mankind in the knowledge of the glorious Creator: and each day and night transmits this task to its successor; or answer to each other, as when men sing in parts, alternately.

V. 3—6. Though the luminaries of heaven are not capable of articulate discourse, as man is, (which seems to be intimidated by the abruptness of the original, “no speech, no language, their voice is not heard;”) yet their instructions may be understood by every nation under heaven: and whilst other teachers are confined to some particular district, they preach to the whole human race. Especially the glorious sun, who hath as it were his tabernacle pitched in the centre of the heavens. Thence every morning he issues forth, in all the vigour, alacrity, and beautiful adorning, with which a bridegroom would leave his chamber to go to his nuptials; and rejoices like an active racer, who glories in his strength, and anticipates the victory when about to start for the prize. Thus he daily diffuses through the whole earth light, warmth, and fertility; and communicates or preserves, every kind of animal and vegetable life, and even penetrates by his piercing beams into the heart of the earth. The sun in the firmament may be considered as an emblem of the Sun of righteousness, diffusing divine light and salvation by his Gospel to the nations of the earth. He delighteth in communicating blessings to his church, which as a Bridegroom he hath espoused to himself: and his course will be unwearied as that of the sun, till the whole earth be filled with his light and salvation. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 7—11. The word here translated law, may be rendered doctrine, and be understood as a general name for divine revelation, as then extant, the law of Moses being the principal part of it. The whole of this is perfect, and is intended to convert the soul from sin and the world, to God and to holiness, or to restore man from his fallen state. By it the Lord testifies to us all those truths which relate to the mysteries and perfections of his nature, to our own state and character, to the way of salvation, and to the eternal world, with the invitations and promises connected with them. This testimony is sure, and entirely to be depended on; and the most ignorant and unlearned, who seem most exposed to delusion, by unreservedly and simply crediting the word of God, become wise to salvation, and learn to live a holy, useful, and happy life, in this evil world: whilst human reasonings on these subjects commonly bewilder men in error and uncertainty. 'This sure testimony preserves ignorant souls from being seduced to worship the sun; for it makes them at the first word so wise as to understand that the LORD "created the heavens and the earth." (Bp. Patrick.) The statutes frequently mean the ordinances of God, by which Israel maintained communion with him, and received all blessings from him. These, though burdensome in themselves, were entirely suited to that dispensation; and proved a source of joy to the believing worshipper. (Marg. Ref.) But some explain the word in this place, to signify the laws given to regulate the conduct of magistrates in administering justice; which were peculiarly equitable, and tended to render the nation happy. The commandment, or the moral law, is "holy, just, and good," and spiritual, enlightening the mind to perceive what men should be and do, and how far they are from that holiness which it demands. Thus they learn their true character, and are shut up under sin and condemnation, and are brought to welcome the divine Saviour, as well as to walk in newness of life. "The fear of the LORD, is clean," as it sets the soul against all sin, and leads to holy watchfulness and diligence; and being once truly implanted in the soul, it will endure for ever. The term also may include the worship rendered to God, according to his word; which was at that time free from all profane mixtures of superstition and idolatry, and from the vile immoralities attending the religion of the surrounding nations. The obligation to this holy worship is perpetual: but the external form was varied, when the old dispensation was superseded by the new, and a more spiritual worship appointed. The judgments commonly in the books of Moses, denote the judicial law: but the term is used in various senses in other parts of Scripture; and may include warnings, counsels, threatenings, and the instances given of divine wrath executed on sinners in different ways. In every sense "the judgments of God were true and righteous altogether," without the least exception in any one particular. (Marg. Ref.) Indeed the sacred word, (even as David had it,) was in his judgment more valuable, because more useful, than much fine gold: and he found it more pleasant than honey to his taste. He loved the Scriptures, especially because they warned him to avoid sins and temptations: nay, the observance of them was its own abundant recompense; though it likewise entitled him to a gracious reward which he had richly experienced.

9 ^a The fear of the LORD is clean, ^y enduring for ever: ^z the judgments of the LORD are ^{*} true and righteous altogether.

10 More to be desired are they ^a than gold, yea, than much fine gold: ^b sweeter also than honey, and [†] the honey-comb.

11 ^c Moreover by them is thy servant warned: and ^d in keeping of them there is great reward.

V. 12—14. From the consideration of the word of God, David's thoughts recurred to himself. Viewed in this glass, his errors, or deviations, appeared innumerable: and he not only desired to be pardoned and cleansed from those sins which he had discovered and confessed, but also from such as he had forgotten or overlooked: for, by secret faults, he evidently meant the transgressions which had escaped his own notice, or vanished from his memory; and not those that he had kept secret from human observation. The treachery of his heart likewise appeared to him so great, that he feared being drawn aside into deliberate and presumptuous sins, and being brought under the dominion of some powerful lust: and this dictated a fervent prayer to be kept back by divine grace from such dreadful crimes and consequences. In this way he hoped to be preserved upright and innocent from the great offence of rebellion, idolatry, or apostasy: and he earnestly entreated that the words of his mouth and the meditation of his heart might, by divine grace, be rendered such as it behooved God to accept, and as might obtain a merciful acceptance in his sight, whom he entitled "his Strength and Redeemer." His dependence therefore was entirely the same with that of every Christian who says, "Surely in the Lord Jesus have I righteousness and strength."

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The heavens so declare the glory of God, and proclaim his wisdom, power, and goodness, that atheists, infidels, idolaters, and all ungodly men, will be for ever left without excuse. Indeed, we may all learn profitable lessons from these constant teachers, who instruct by day and night, men in every clime, and of every tongue. By considering these inanimate servants of our Creator, we may learn to adore his magnificence and liberality; and we may be stirred up to cheerfulness, constancy, and diligence in doing good; and to use our nobler gifts of reason and speech to proclaim his praise. The transition is thence easy and natural to the contemplation of the Sun of righteousness, the Bridegroom of the church, and the Light of the world. Whilst we walk in his holy light and consolations, and are made fruitful in good works by his genial influence; we should long and pray for that time, when he shall enlighten, cheer, and fructify every nation on earth with his blessed salvation. He shines upon us through his word; may he send forth numbers to publish it! Where that is truly received, it converteth the soul from sin to God. May we heartily believe his sure testimony, and imbibe heavenly wisdom from this pure and inexhaustible fountain: may we rejoice in attending on all his ordinances; and thus receive communications of light, grace, strength, and consolation from the fulness of Christ, and render to the Lord the glory due unto his name: may we study and understand his enlightening commandments; examining ourselves by them, and walking with delight according to their holy instructions, whilst we embrace and daily plead the precious promises before our God: may his pure and purifying fear, which endureth for ever, be deeply grafted in our hearts; that we may stand in awe of his righteous judgments, and be warned from every evil way; that we may flee for refuge to his gracious salvation, and have our consciences directed, and our hearts encouraged by every part of his sacred word. Then shall we prize our Bibles more than all manner of riches, and find more delight in them than in all the pleasures of sense: being guided by them into that happy path which leads to still more complete felicity in the eternal world. But let it be observed, that the more any man studies and understands the holy Scriptures, the more deeply will he be convinced of his own sinfulness, in thought, word, and deed: serious and frequent self-examination by this faithful mirror, will discover to him innumerable deviations from his perfect rule; and convince him that those, which have escaped his recollection or observation, are equally innumerable. This will induce him to cast himself unreservedly upon the mercy and grace of God, for deliverance from those sins which have been hitherto unnoticed by himself. He will also grow more jealous of his own heart, and afraid of temptation, lest he should be drawn into presumptuous sins, and come under the dominion of them: and whilst he longs, more and more to be preserved from every transgression, and that his thoughts, words, and works, may be acceptable to the Lord: he will feel more sensibly his own insufficiency for

NOTES.

PSALM XX. V. 1, 2. This psalm was doubtless composed, and publicly sung, when David was about to engage in some perilous expedition: it is generally thought, in that against the Ammonites and Syrians. (2 Sam. x. 1 Chr. xix.) And the congregation of Israel thus prayed for his protection and success, to the God of Jacob, to that God who heard the patriarch in his distress, and was still the God of his posterity. Among them he had fixed his sanctuary and the ark of the covenant, which had lately been removed to mount Zion; and from him, the great object of their worship, as manifesting his glory above the mercy-seat, they sought help and victory. But David was a type of Christ, in his conflicts and victories: and the psalm may be applied as a prayer for his coming, for the completion of his work, and the establishment of his kingdom.

V. 3. The oblations at the sanctuary, when presented in humble faith and love, were graciously accepted, as typical of the Redeemer's atoning sacrifice: and the answer, by fire from heaven consuming the victims, was the most decisive proof of this acceptance. David's burnt-offering, not long after, was thus consumed. (Marg.)

V. 4. David earnestly desired to promote the honour of God and the welfare of Israel, in his counsels and undertakings; and it was proper for the people to pray for him in this expressive language: but in respect of the designs of our great Redeemer, the words may be adopted in the most unreserved manner.

V. 5. The king of Israel was their anointed deliverer; and when they went forth to war under his command, they might properly set up their banners in the name of the LORD, as well as rejoice in his salvation. “In confidence of thy help, we will shout when we set on our enemies: for the Lord will not fail to grant the petitions of our Sovereign, whose cause is so just, and who has been so insolently treated.” (Bp. Patrick.)

PSALM XXI.

The king and people rejoicing in God, and blessing him for fully answering their largest prayers, 1-6. Expressing the strongest assurance of future success, with the ruin of all their enemies, 7-12. And calling upon God to exalt himself, that they might more and more sing his praises, 13.

To the chief Musician, A Psalm of David.

V. 6-8. David himself seems to speak. His past deliverances and victories, and the loyal zeal of his people, assured him of success, from the power of Israel's God. Comparing the confidence of his enemies in chariots and horses and well-appointed numerous troops, with his own and that of his people on the Almighty; he anticipated the triumph, and exulted as if already victorious.

V. 9. 'Let the King of heaven hear, whilst we pray for his anointed on earth.' Or the clause may literally be rendered, "O LORD, save the king; hear us when we call."

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

No rank or character can exempt man from trouble: but the Lord will hear the prayers of the afflicted, and will support and deliver them. They who pray most fervently for themselves, put the greatest value on the prayers of others; and are encouraged by them in further calling upon God. His name, his glorious perfections, will be a sure defence to all who, like Jacob, trust and apply to him in their distress; but we should observe, that all our help comes out of Zion, from the mercy-seat, and through the accepted sacrifice of our Emmanuel, which all the legal burnt-offerings shadowed forth. As far as our desires are spiritual and our counsels holy, we may hope to have them granted and fulfilled; but it would be ruinous to have our sinful inclinations indulged. Fervent united prayers tend much to the joyful assurance of faith and hope; and the first step to victory in our spiritual warfare is, to renounce all carnal confidences, and to trust only in the mercy and grace of God: thus we shall arise from our depth of misery, and obtain establishment; whilst all who trust in themselves will soon be brought down. Happy is it for that people whose rulers are influenced in all their measures by the faith and fear of God, aiming at his glory and the public good: when they value the prayers of true Christians, and act with such justice, that pious men can unreservedly pray for their success: when they set up their banners in the name of God; and place their confidence, not in fleets and armies, but in his powerful protection. From his holy heaven he will save with the strength of his right hand, such as thus trust in him. It is our duty to pray for our rulers, that they may be like David: and we have great cause for thankfulness for our peculiar advantages in this respect; and we should continually entreat the Lord, that they who are or shall be placed over us, may be directed and prospered in every undertaking, for the honour of God, the peace and welfare of the land, and the common benefit of mankind. In answer to the hopes and prayers of the old testament-church, the anointed King of God's people came in the appointed season: he was heard in the day of his trouble; his sacrifice was accepted; his intercessions have greatly prevailed; his kingdom hath been set up, and we are called to partake of its blessings. Thanksgivings for these benefits should be constantly rendered. In his salvation let us rejoice; under him let us enlist, and in his name set up our banners. But we should recollect, that we belong to a large army; and we should not only seek and rejoice in hope of personal triumphs; but pray for the success of the common cause; and look for the accomplishment of the Redeemer's whole counsel, when his dominion over willing subjects shall be extended throughout the earth.

NOTES.

PSALM XXI. V. 1. The former psalm was the prayer of Israel for David, and of the church for the Messiah; and this is a song of praise to God, who had answered those prayers. Several circumstances of the psalm may be accommodated to the case of David. Yet the whole seems more immediately intended for Christ and his kingdom. 'Many of the Hebrews themselves apply it to the Messiah. So that it may be called a psalm of triumph after the victories which David got over his enemies, which were a type of Christ's victory over death, and of the triumph that ensued. And truly there are some things in it which are more literally fulfilled in Christ than in David.' (Bp. Patrick.) David had risen to great authority: but he exulted and rejoiced in the strength and power of God, which had wrought many and great deliverances for him; made him the deliverer of Israel from all their enemies, and was engaged for his eternal salvation. Thus our Lord, being raised from the dead, entered on the "joy set before him;" which includes the salvation of his people, to the glory of God the Father, as well as his own exaltation to the mediatorial throne.

V. 2-5. God had, on all occasions, answered the prayers of his servant; had prevented him by anointing him to be king, before he had thought of such an honour; and had made him successful and distinguished beyond his largest hopes. The Lord had not only very often preserved his life, in answer to his prayers, when in the most imminent danger: but had given him the assurance of continuing the kingdom in his family for many generations, and in Christ, as his descendant, for ever: and he was encouraged personally to expect everlasting life in heaven. Thus his glory was in all respects great in God's salvation. Yet the passage, in its fullest import, can only be accomplished in Christ himself.

V. 6, 7. The marginal rendering, "Thou hast set him to be blessings for evermore," seems to be the most literal, and to suggest another important thought on the subject. David was set to be blessings, not only to his own generation, and to his posterity, and to Israel for many ages; but by these divine poems to the whole church, while the world shall endure; and in Christ his Son, to all eternity; and thus he was placed to be blessed or praised for evermore, as some render the clause. (Note, Gen. xii. 1-3.)—David also enjoyed great felicity in the favour of God; and trusting in his mercy, could not be moved, either in respect of his authority or his personal salvation: and the glory and dominion of Christ, to the praise of the glory of divine grace, are beyond the reach of all his enemies and those of his church.

V. 8-12. These verses indicate, that the opposers of Israel's anointed King were likewise the enemies of God; who would assuredly take vengeance on them and their posterity, in the most awful manner, making them the butt, or mark, of his severest displeasure. But they may be considered as addressed to the Messiah himself; and no doubt they receive their fullest accomplishments in the judgments inflicted on the opposers and despisers of his authority and Gospel. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 13. Both the prosperity of the church, and the ruin of its enemies, tend to exalt God, or to render his glory conspicuous to his rational creatures. These effects can only be produced by his Omnipotence; which his people unitedly pray to see displayed, that they may joyfully celebrate his praises. This conclusion greatly resembles the first petitions and closing doxology of the Lord's prayer.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

If David rejoiced greatly in the honour conferred on him, as king of Israel: what is the joy of our Redeemer in his exaltation to the mediatorial throne, and in the salvation of his people! And if Israel, from love to David and his auspicious government, rejoiced, and praised God for him: how great should be our joy and praise, to behold by faith our Brother and Friend thus glorified, and for all the blessings which we may expect from him! The Father was as ready to grant, as his beloved Son to ask, when he desired to be crowned, not with gold, but with glory and honour, and to have all things put under his feet; and to possess an unchangeable kingdom, for the benefit of his church: nay, our God presents us sinners with the blessings of his goodness; and if we ask he will give us "a crown of glory that fadeth not away," and "long life even for ever and ever;" and the requests of the Saviour's lips are not withheld, whilst sinners are converted and believers established through his intercession. Words cannot express his glory in God's salvation, the honour and majesty which are laid upon him, and the adoration which is rendered to him by angels and saints above: yet he chiefly delights in his exalted state, as enabling him to confer "an exceeding and eternal weight of glory," on poor sinners, who here trust and love him. For being made most blessed himself for ever, he is constituted to be the source of blessings, and the author of eternal salvation to all them that obey him. His kingdom is fixed on an immoveable basis, upheld by the power of God; and the exercise of the mercy of the Most High forms its grand object. But how will they escape, who are enemies to this glorious King and Saviour? The Jewish nation soon experienced the dreadful effects of his slighted love; and the condition of their posterity, from the siege and sack of Jerusalem to this day, awfully warns every one not to entail miseries on his descendants, and bring destruction on himself, by opposing the Redeemer's kingdom, or neglecting his salvation. But the discoveries that will be made, and the vengeance that will be executed, at the day of judgment, on every enemy of Christ, will form the most tremendous comment on this psalm. In that day of his anger, all who hate him will be made as the fiery oven; they will be swallowed up and devoured; their devices will end in everlasting disappointment and despair; and all the arrows of the Almighty will be prepared to execute his righteous vengeance upon them. May he then exalt himself by his efficacious grace in our hearts, destroying all the strong holds of sin and Satan: and may he by his own strength, set up his kingdom upon earth and exalt himself above every antichristian opposer: so will we, so will his whole church, sing and praise his power, which only doeth wondrous things; as an anticipation of the joys and songs of the redeemed, when they shall see the last enemy put under the Redeemer's feet.

NOTES.

PSALM XXII. Title. Aijelet Shaha, signifies The hind of the morning: and various conjectures have been made concerning the intention of this singular title. Some think it merely a musical term: and others suppose it refers to the time when it was to be sung, rendering it the first dawn. Others apply it to Christ, as the Light of the world, whose rising was predicted: but perhaps it points out the Saviour, marked by Satan from his birth for persecution, as the hind or hart is in the morning for chase; and so hunted down by his enemies, until he was surrounded by them, (as dogs surround the weary hart,) when he hung upon the cross. Of this the persecutions of David in his earlier years were a type.

V. 1. The first clause of this verse is exactly of the same import with the words used by our Lord on the cross. (Marg. Ref.) The Hebrew verb indeed is changed in this exclamation for one supposed to be Syriac: but the Evangelist's interpretation is given in the very words of the Septuagint. No reasonable doubt can be made, but that he should be considered as the speaker, throughout this whole prophetic psalm. It may even be questioned whether David had any reference to his own case in it; as every thing is applicable to Christ, and most things utterly inapplicable to David.—Whilst the man Jesus, without any personal transgression or defilement, but bearing our sins in their guilt and punishment, was wholly deprived of all sensible comfort, and felt that horror in his soul which is the effect of the divine wrath; whilst the powers of darkness were permitted to assail him with every dreadful temptation, and whilst wicked men unrestrainedly exercised their cruel malice towards him; his God and Father seemed to have forsaken him, and to stand at a distance from his salvation as regardless of his agonies and prayers. Yet still he used the language of vigorous faith, conflicting with, and prevailing against, all despondency and impatience.

V. 2. The Lord Jesus continued whole nights in prayer, he arose a great while before day for that purpose; and in the cold dark night he prostrated himself in the garden, and “prayed most earnestly;” yet did not the cup of his sufferings for sinners pass from him. He felt a natural reluctance to such tremendous sorrows; but his zeal and love prevailed, and when he added, “not my will but “thine be done,” he, as it were, retracted his former petition. The prophecy expresses the feelings of his soul in the extremity of his suffering: yet his supplications were heard, as it soon appeared in his resurrection.

V. 3. This verse seems to be admirably expressive of perfect resignation under the severest sufferings, which peculiarly accords with the prophetic meaning. “Thou hearest not.”—“Shall I then murmur, or impeach thy faithfulness? Far from it! Thou, nevertheless, continuest ‘holy, &c.’ Thus our Lord, on the cross, declared the holiness of God in his sharpest sufferings: nay, he declared them to be a demonstration of it; for which he would be continually praised by Israel, more than for all the other deliverances, that they had received in answer to their faith and prayer: and he considered all those as types and earnestness of his own deliverance, when he had completed his expiation. In Israel, in the church, exclusively, the works and perfections of God are celebrated.

V. 6. The Saviour here spake of the extremely abject state to which he was reduced; in which he was treated as a worm, and patiently submitted to it; being humble, silent, and harmless, when oppressed and trodden under foot.

—The language is highly expressive of the contempt, with which he was treated by all ranks and orders of men, whether Jews or Gentiles.

V. 7, 8. The history of Christ's sufferings is the best comment on this part of the prophecy; the language of the former verse might be thought historical of the insults attending his crucifixion; and that of the latter was adopted, without any variation at all affecting the sense, by the chief priests and rulers, to express their contempt of him, when hanging upon the cross. Little did they think that the Spirit of prophecy, a thousand years before, had foretold that the murderers of the Messiah would speak of him in this insulting and impious manner. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 9, 10. David seems early to have devoted himself to God: but Jesus alone was a holy child, born without sin. He was not only the peculiar care of Providence from his birth; but from his earliest infancy he exercised the most perfect faith, hope, and love, towards his God and Father.

V. 11—13. A helpless infant or a harmless lamb, surrounded by furious bulls and hungry fierce lions, aptly represented the Saviour surrounded with his insulting and bloody persecutors; and in his extreme distress forsaken even by his disciples. The bulls, which fed in the fertile pastures of Bashan, were remarkably fat, and strong, and furious; and they represented the Jewish rulers, who were rendered insolent by prosperity.

V. 14, 15. The dissolution of nature, and the unresisting sufferings of Christ when "crucified in weakness," are expressed, by his being poured out as water; the stretching of his body on the cross, and the violent motion with which it was erected, shook his body even to the dislocation of his bones. His sense of the divine wrath against our sins, then laid upon him, and his inward anguish made his heart faint and melt within him, as wax by the fire. Thus the vigour and moisture of his body were dried up, as with intense heat: his extreme thirst caused his tongue to cleave

Christian era, renders it as we do; and there seems scarcely the shadow of a doubt, but this is the genuine reading:
 though the general exactness of the Jews in preserving their Scriptures, precludes the charge of an intentional alteration. Let any thinking man recollect, that the Jews, the greatest opposers of Christianity ever since its promulgation, have unanimously allowed, that David wrote this psalm above a thousand years before the birth of Christ:
 then let him compare it with the history of his crucifixion, and determine, whether it doth not stand as an irrefragable argument of the divine inspiration of the Scriptures, and for the divine original of the Christian religion.

V. 19-21. In these verses, the Psalmist, (personating the suffering Redeemer,) having stated the extremity of his case, renews his supplications; and earnestly prays to be delivered from the sword of divine justice, stretched forth against him, as our Surety; from Satan, the chief of those blood-hounds or roaring lions, that pursued him; and from the enraged enemies, who like the fiercest wild beasts surrounded him, as if they aimed at his entire and final destruction. The word rendered my darling, signifies my united one, or my desolate one. It is the feminine of the noun, rendered elsewhere only son, or only begotten son; and thus the Septuagint translate it. Some think it refers to the human nature of Christ, as united to the Deity.

V. 22. This verse is expressly applied to our Lord by the Apostle. (Heb. ii. 11.) And the subsequent part of the psalm is as evidently prophetic of his glory and the success of his Gospel, as the foregoing part is of his sufferings. The transition from the one part to the other, and indeed the whole, is allowed to be highly poetical. For here the scene at once changes and brightens. The Saviour turns his eyes from his sufferings to the glory which followed; and anticipating the extensive and permanently blessed effects of his passion and exaltation, he breaks forth into exulting predictions and praises at the prospect. So that what follows seems descriptive of his feelings when he cried "It is finished," and "Father into thy hands I commend my spirit."

V. 23, 24. Some expositors think that these verses are the song of praise, which the Messiah declares he will lead in the midst of the congregation. Israel is especially addressed, but all who are favoured with the Gospel are equally concerned in the exhortation; as the resurrection and consequent glory of Christ are the common benefit of all that fear and seek God: for had he despised and rejected the Surety's sufferings, and left him in the grave, all the hopes of sinners would have been for ever buried with him. But, though man despised and abhorred him, and the Father for a time seemed to disregard his sufferings and prayers; and though the character of those, whom he represented, was abominable in the sight of God: God yet accepted the Saviour's atoning sacrifice, raised him from the dead, and made him "the author of eternal salvation to all them that obey him."

V. 25. Vows, &c. That is, the Saviour will publicly fulfil all the engagements of his exaltation, for the glory of God, and the benefit of his church; even as the Psalmist offered the various sacrifices which he had vowed in his distresses.

V. 26. The death of Christ was the great sacrifice for sin: his "flesh is meat indeed, and his blood drink indeed;" the poor in spirit feed on this provision in their hearts by faith, and are satisfied: thus whilst they seek the Lord, they praise him also, and their hearts or souls are preserved unto eternal life.—The sacred feasts on the peace-offerings and vows, at the sanctuary, furnished this allusion.

V. 27, 28. The fallen race of Adam in general, all over the world, had forgotten, through alienation of heart, the one living and true God, and their relations and obligations to him, as their Creator, Governor, and Judge:
 but through the sufferings of Christ and the glory that followed, vast multitudes in the most distant nations, remembered God; and forsaking their idols and iniquities, turned to him, as his worshippers and subjects. Thus the kingdom of God, which always was his by right, began in fact to be established among the nations: but this part of the prophecy has by no means yet received its grand accomplishment.

V. 29. Even the rich and powerful on earth are invited to this feast, and must feed on this spiritual provision, or they must starve : they must worship and submit to the exalted Saviour, or perish : they, that persist in their rebellion, must bow as condemned criminals before his tribunal. The most exalted and the most abased, in this respect, are precisely in the same situation ; none can preserve his body from death, or raise it again from the dust ; none can quicken his own soul, or save it from final condemnation. In both respects Christ alone is “ the Resurrection and the Life ; ” and at length all that sleep in the dust must bow before his tribunal, and all his believing subjects will enter into his joy.

V. 30, 31. Some in every age will be the servants of Christ : they shall be accounted or registered a chosen generation to the Lord ; and shall supplant the Jewish nation, though not descended from one common stock, being the children of God by a spiritual birth. They shall come from every quarter to enlarge the church ; one generation shall declare to another his righteousness and salvation ; and his atoning death and consequent glory shall be their favourite topics.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—21.

The stupendous scene here exhibited should attract our most serious and affectionate attention. Let us therefore step aside from worldly trifles, to “ behold the Lamb of God, that taketh away the sin of the world.” Let us contemplate the depth of the Saviour’s humiliation in connexion with his personal dignity ; and his intense sufferings, contrasted with the infinite delight that the Father had in him, and the combination of all excellencies in his character. Let us hearken to his complaints and groans ; let us attend to his strong crying and tears ; his agony and temptations, and the cruelty and contempt with which he was treated by Jews and Gentiles, priests, rulers, people, and soldiers ; till ingenuity was exhausted, and malice itself fatigued with mocking and tormenting him. Let us view this holy Saviour surrounded by bulls, lions, and ravenous dogs ; in the palace of the high priest, in Herod’s, and Pilate’s, judgment hall. Let us next look to him as nailed to the cross, pouring out his blood like water ; inquiring in doleful accents “ My God, My God, why hast thou forsaken me ? ” and complaining, “ All my bones are out of joint, my heart is as wax, it is melted in the midst of my bowels ; ” till at length his death closed the awful scene, whilst nature also seemed expiring in convulsions. What then do we learn from these astonishing events, and this extraordinary prediction of them ? Here we behold the eternal justice and holiness of our God ; the immutable excellency and obligation of his law ; the inconceivable odiousness and guilt of sin ; the inestimable worth of our souls ; the ruined state of man ; the insufficiency of all other expedients for magnifying the law, or satisfying the justice of God ; the vanity of the world, and the misery of its deluded inhabitants ; the dire malignity of the human heart, which naturally conceived and expressed such cruel hatred and contempt of him, who was “ the Brightness of the Father’s glory, and the express Image of his person ; ” the infinitely free love and compassion of God the Father and of our Lord Jesus Christ, for us wretched sinners ; the foundation of every human hope ; the source of all grace and consolation ; the exemplar to which we are to be conformed, the treatment we are to expect from man, and the conduct under it, which, as Christians, we are to adopt. In short, the whole system of true religion is here viewed in its central point ; and every lesson is learned, with peculiar advantage, by the enlightened and humbled soul.

In this part of the psalm, viewed in connexion with the former, we behold the ransom accepted, the Saviour heard, and raised and exalted to his glorious throne : we view him at the right hand of the Father, receiving inestimable gifts to bestow on sinful man, and not ashamed to call his poor disciples brethren ; declaring among them, and by them to the world, the name and truths of God ; fulfilling in his exaltation the design of all his sufferings ; and calling on all, that fear and seek the Lord, to rejoice in, to praise, and glorify him. He now gives us his flesh and blood, to be the life-giving and preserving food of our souls : on this the meek and humble feed with delight, praise the Lord for it, and live for ever : and all, however powerful or honourable, who refuse this provision, and will not worship the exalted Saviour, must perish : for the kingdom is the Lord’s, and the once crucified Jesus is the Governor among the nations : and no man can by any means keep alive his own soul. Whilst numbers despise, and wonder, and perish ; from age to age a seed is raised up to serve the Redeemer, who are accounted to the Lord for a chosen generation ; and who declare his righteousness and works of love, to those who surround, and those that shall succeed them. Thus the Gentiles have been brought into his church, which is preserved in the midst of opposition : and ere long “ All the ends of the earth shall remember, and turn unto the Lord, and all the kindreds of the nations shall worship before him.” Let the infidel then study this psalm with serious attention, and no longer object his futile cavils in opposition to demonstration. Let those, who go about to establish their own righteousness, inquire why the beloved Son of God thus suffered, if their performances could atone for sin, or recommend a sinner to his offended God? Let the antinomian consider, whether the Saviour thus honoured the divine law, to purchase him the liberty of despising it? Let the careless take warning to flee from the wrath to come, and the trembling be encouraged, and rest their hopes upon this merciful Redeemer. The tempted and distressed believer should contemplate this scene, and learn to imitate the faith, patience, meekness, constancy, persevering prayers, fervent zeal, and love of the suffering Saviour; and cheerfully expect a happy event of every trial. Finally, let us never be ashamed to profess our faith in him and obligations to him, who condescends to own us as his brethren: but instruct our families in the important truths of his Gospel, desiring above all things, and praying continually, that they may be a seed to serve him; and that all the ends of the earth may hear and receive his Gospel, and become his believing and accepted servants and worshippers.

NOTES.

PSALM XXIII. V. 1—3. The preceding psalm represented “the good Shepherd laying down his life for “the sheep,” and assuming his pastoral charge: this describes their safety and felicity under his tender care. For as Christ is the good, the great, the chief Shepherd; we cannot doubt, but he is JEHOVAH, and is especially intended. (Marg. Ref.) A flock of sheep, gentle, harmless, and valuable, feeding in verdant pastures, or reclining, cheerful and satisfied, by gentlerivulets, under the care of a skilful, vigilant, and tender shepherd, forms the emblem of believers, brought back to the Shepherd of their souls, and by him guarded and provided for. He is JEHOVAH, the omnipresent, omniscient, almighty God, One with the Father, and every way able and willing to take care of them. His ordinances are their plenteous pastures, the consolations of his Holy Spirit are their refreshing waters. They are thus guided by their Shepherd into communion with God, and find rest in their souls. If they wander, he restores them by his kind rebukes, and his effectual grace; when their souls are diseased, He, as their physician, recovers their health and vigour; and for the honour of his Gospel, and the glory of his name, he leads them in the paths of righteousness.

V. 4. Betwixt that part of the flock which is on earth and that which is gone to heaven, death lies, like a deep valley, that must be passed in going from the one to the other. But this valley cannot hurt believers, and should not alarm them. It is indeed deep and dark, but fruitful. The good Shepherd will accompany his sheep through it, by his gracious presence: his rod, the token of his power, will defend them from the assaults of their enemies; his pastoral staff, his word of promise and Spirit of grace, will support them with inward strength; and thus he will render death safe and comfortable to them.

V. 5, 6. The people of God feast at his table upon the provisions of his love; nor can Satan and wicked men, who hate and envy them, destroy their comforts, whilst they are anointed with the unction of the Holy Spirit, and drink of the cup of salvation, ever full and running over. Past experience teaches them to trust, “that the goodness “and mercy of God will follow them all the days of their “life.” It is their desire, expectation, and determination to seek their happiness in the service of God here, and they hope to enjoy his love, without enemy or interruption, for length of days, even for ever in heaven hereafter. The images in these verses are taken from feasts, and the general customs of anointing the guests, and distinguishing such as were most favoured by the largest portions. (Gen. xliii. 34.) Under these images both temporal provisions and spiritual comforts seem to be included.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

Experimental piety is the source of the purest, strongest comforts, and the most unshaken confidence: and cheerfulness greatly adorns and recommends it. What can they want, who have JEHOVAH for their Shepherd? What will he withhold from his friends, who shed his blood for them when enemies, that he might reconcile them to himself? Will not he, who ransomed our souls, provide for our bodies? Alas, our discontent and disconsolation spring from unbelief, and from a consequent unsteady walk, which darkens our prospects and weakens our evidence. Let us give diligence to make our calling and election sure: let us simply trust our Shepherd's care, and listen to his voice; let us cultivate the gentle and amiable dispositions which these emblems suggest: let us keep close to his ordinances, as the pasture of our souls; and draw the waters of life with joy from the wells of salvation, seeking no other consolations; and let us earnestly desire to be kept from wandering, or speedily to be restored from every devious step; for peace and safety can be found only in the paths of righteousness. Thus walking with God and trusting in him, we may think of death, as our appointed passage to eternal life, without fearing any evil: the outward protection and inward supports of our gracious Friend will prevent all harm, and he will receive our souls to the mansion which he hath prepared for them. Whilst he pleases that we should continue here, he can make any situation pleasant, by the unction of his Spirit and the joys of his salvation, in defiance of all our enemies: and the lively Christian, will thankfully acknowledge the Lord's exuberant kindness, and declare his satisfaction in his care and love. Let us then thank him for the past and present, and trust him for the future: let us keep close to his service now; and simply repose our confidence in him, that his goodness will supply our every want, his mercy pardon all our sins, and relieve all our sorrows: that these shall follow us all the days of our life; and that we shall dwell in the house of the Lord for ever; "in his presence, where is fulness of joy, and at his right hand, where are pleasures for evermore."

But the ascension of Christ into heaven seems to have been sublimely prefigured under those typical events. The Psalmist introduced his subject, by declaring the sovereignty of God over the whole world. He had formed both the earth and its inhabitants, and separated the dry land from the waters, by which it arose out of the floods, and seemed to have its foundation upon them. The whole belonged to the great Creator, to be disposed of as he pleased. And he might most justly have cut off all the apostate race; or he might have taken another part of it instead of Israel. This introduction, therefore, seems to have been intended to excite the people's admiring gratitude for the Lord's distinguishing kindness to them.

V. 3—6. External privileges were granted to Israel: but the character of the true Israelite was here inquired after. (Notes, &c. Psalm xv.) A holy life, springing from a sanctified heart, free from external and mental idolatry, and all corrupt affections and carnal confidences, united with watchfulness against all hypocrisy and dissimulation; and an exact punctuality and fidelity to every vow, profession, or engagement to God or man, distinguished the acceptable worshippers from the rest of the congregation at the sanctuary; as they do real from nominal Christians. This character originates from regeneration; and is gradually formed by the divine Spirit, through faith: and while others derive no benefit from divine ordinances, persons of this description receive blessings from the Lord continually; even "righteousness from the God of salvation." For "by the Spirit they wait for the hope of "righteousness through faith." (Marg. Ref.) Thus, it is very clearly stated, that while separation from sin and a pious conscientious conduct, prepare a man's heart for receiving divine blessings, and evidence his interest in them; yet they do not constitute his justifying righteousness, or merit the favour of God; in whom he must trust as the God of his salvation, and from whom he must receive the gift of righteousness by faith. They who thus trust and serve God, constitute the generation of those who

David, trusting in God and waiting on him, prays for protection and guidance, seek him, as Jacob did, and thus enjoy his favour. The last clause is thus rendered in the old translation, “This is Jacob :” the true seed of Abraham, the true Israel.

V. 7—10. It is supposed, that the priests that bare the ark, and the Levites who attended them, demanded entrance into the tabernacle from those who kept the gates. The expression “Lift up your heads, O ye gates,” may allude to the form in which the gates were made, the upper part lifting up, to render the entrance more spacious: the gates might be called everlasting, because the ark was to have an abiding residence on mount Zion, where a durable temple was about to be erected. To this demand the porters within answered in solemn strains, “Who is this King of glory?” and were again answered, that it was “the LORD, strong, and mighty, the LORD, mighty in battle;” that is, Israel’s Protector and Friend, by whose power they were victorious over all their enemies. The demand being then repeated, and a similar answer returned, the gates we may suppose, were thrown open, and the symbol of the divine presence was carried into the holy of holies. This is supposed to represent the Saviour, at his ascension, demanding by his attendant angels admission into heaven, as Man and Mediator; yet at the same time as “the King of glory, and the LORD strong and mighty.” In human nature, and even on the cross, he had overcome, and triumphed over the powers of darkness; and ascending up on high, he led them captive at his chariot-wheels. To him the everlasting portals were lifted up, who was at the same time a Man and the LORD of hosts; and as our forerunner he entered heaven amidst the admiring acclamations of the whole angelic choir. And thus the gates of the heavenly happiness were opened to every sinner, who receives Christ as his Lord and Saviour, assured that indeed he is the Lord of hosts and the King of glory.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

As the earth, with its fulness and inhabitants, belongs to the great Creator, whose glorious wisdom, power, and goodness appear on every side, we should continually remember our obligations to love and serve him with all our powers; to receive all our comforts as his gifts, and to employ all according to his will. This must also remind us of our need of his mercy, and lead us to continual humiliation before him: for which of his gifts have we not abused? Which of our powers have we not employed in rebellion? If we had done all that was commanded us, we ought to have said, we are unprofitable servants. How absurd then for sinners to boast of their scanty and defective services! It is of the Lord’s mercy, that we any of us worship with acceptance, or may hope to enter into heaven. We should be thankful for outward privileges: yet let us be careful not to trust in them, but seriously inquire whether his word and ordinances have indeed been sanctifying to our hearts, and have taught us to walk in newness of life? Whether we are weaned from the vanities of the world, and delivered from hypocrisy and deceit in our professions and engagements? The generation of them who seek and serve the God of Jacob, are formed to a peculiar character; the blessings of salvation and the crown of righteousness must be waited for in the way of conscientious obedience; and they who expect them in any other way will find themselves awfully deluded. The incarnate Word and Son of God, having completed his obedience and sufferings on earth as our Surety, hath, in human nature, ascended up on high, as a triumphant conqueror. The everlasting portals have been thrown open to receive him. He alone in human nature ascended thither by the merit of his own righteousness: but it is of infinite value, and merit for us also if we believe in him. Whilst angels adore, in the man Christ Jesus, the King of glory and the LORD of hosts, and welcome him as Head over all things to his church: surely we cannot refuse him our thankful acclamations, or neglect to honour him, as we ought to honour the Father that sent him. Let all remember that he is able to save and to destroy: “the LORD strong and mighty, the LORD mighty in battle.” If we refuse now to open our hearts to welcome him, he will at length refuse to open the gates of heaven to us; both at the hour of death, and when after the final judgment, he shall re-enter the heavenly palace with all the millions of his redeemed people. Then all unbelievers shall go away into everlasting punishment. Lord, open the doors of our souls by thy grace, that we may now receive thee, and be willingly and wholly thine; and that at length we may be numbered with thy saints in glory everlasting!

1—5. Pleading the mercy of God and the honour of his name, he entreats forgiveness; and shows the Lord’s readiness to teach the meek and upright, 6—11. He shows the privileges of the godly, and blends his complaints with earnest prayers for himself and Israel, 12—22.

complaints throughout this psalm, favour the opinion of those who think it was written during Absalom's rebellion, by which David's atrocious crimes in the matter of Uriah, as well as the sins of his youth, were brought to his remembrance. The expression, "unto thee do I lift up my soul," emphatically describes the nature of fervent prayer, when all dependence on creatures and expectation from them, are sensibly renounced; and the earnest desires of the soul accompany the voice, but are indeed too large for utterance.

V. 2, 3. These verses are rendered in most versions, as a prayer, which they certainly imply: but the future tense being used, and not the imperative, as in the following verses, they may be rendered more literally, "O my God, I trust in thee: I shall not be ashamed: my enemies shall not triumph over me. Yea, none that wait on thee shall be ashamed: they shall be ashamed who act perfidiously without cause." David had given Saul and his adherents no just cause to hate and persecute him; nor had Absalom or the rebellious Israelites any cause for their treason and perfidy. Their hatred was not only unmerited, but directly contrary to his deserts. It was wholly free or gratuitous. Thus the Jews hated Christ without a cause, or freely: the same word being employed, which the apostle uses in respect of a sinner's justification before God, "Being justified freely." (John xv. 25. Rom. iii. 24. Greek.)

V. 4, 5. 'It is hard to know what to do in these difficult times, especially in this great agitation of my thoughts, wherein my troubled mind is tossed up and down. Therefore, do thou be pleased, O Lord, to show me the course thou wouldest have me to take, and govern my actions so, that they may be pleasing unto thee. I have as much need of thy guidance, as a little child has of its parent's, and I cry as earnestly unto thee, that thou wilt direct me at every step.' (Bp. Patrick.) To be guided in the path of faithfulness to men and faith in God, inviolable adherence to truth and duty in such circumstances, was peculiarly desirable. For this blessing, more than for victory, David waited continually, all the day, and every day, on God his Saviour, (so the Septuagint reads it.) The term, wait, implies a simple, dependent, expecting, attentive state of heart; which leads to frequency and constancy in the use of proper means, perseveringly, notwithstanding delays and discouragements, with a resolute rejection of all other confidences and all inconsistent measures.

V. 6, 7. The contrast between the Lord's remembering his tender mercies and loving kindnesses, which had always been exercised to his worshippers, and sprang from everlasting love, and his not remembering the Psalmist's transgressions, is very expressive. When God thus remembers his mercies, he ceases to remember our sins; that is, he does not punish us for them. The language also is peculiarly emphatical. The distinction between the sins of youth, thus brought afresh to remembrance, and later transgressions, of which David was conscious, seems to fix the occasion of the psalm to have been as above stated. He could find no reason, in himself, why God should remember him in mercy; but he pleads with him to do it for his own goodness' sake. (Marg. Ref.)—Most of the verses in this psalm begin with the Hebrew letters, in alphabetical order; (of which there are several instances in the psalms:) but a few omissions and variations are found, which some ascribe to the perturbation of David's mind.

V. 8, 9. The goodness and mercy of God dispose him to be kind even to sinners, and instead of inflicting immediate vengeance, to use various methods of bringing them to repentance. He is upright and sincere in all his declarations and invitations, and he loveth truth and justice: he is therefore ever ready to teach his ways of peace and holiness to all those, however sinful, who are humbly willing to learn them, that they may enter and walk in them. But the proud and obstinate, who feel no want of such instructions, or desires after them, and are not disposed to practise what they know, do not properly apply for divine teaching. And as the Master in this school is "meek, and lowly in heart," and teaches with gentleness and wisdom, the scholars should surely be teachable, and learn in meekness and humility.

V. 10. All the dealings of God with those that accept of his new covenant salvation, and walk with him, by faith in his truths and promises, and in obedience to his commandments, are the result of his wisdom, and consistent with his mercy and faithfulness; and therefore they will all eventually do them good, whatever present appearances may be. Or, all the commands and counsels of God, the paths in which he calls his people to walk with him, are good in themselves, and do good to the upright; and lead them to experience the fulfilment of his merciful and faithful promises.

V. 11. Had David's iniquity been great, and had he thought it but little, this plea would have been inadmissible: but his argument was, that "where sin had abounded, grace might much more abound." Thus the name or perfections of God would be displayed and glorified: and on this ground he hoped for pardon of his most atrocious sins, and on this alone; so that, if this plea did not prevail, he must sink in hopeless misery.

V. 12, 13. It is said of all unconverted men, that "There is no fear of God before their eyes:" but "the fear of the Lord is the beginning of wisdom." Where then is that man, in this evil world, who truly reverences the authority of God, who fears his displeasure, and seeks his favour, as the main concern of his life? However disadvantageously he may be circumstanced; how great soever his past guilt, or his present darkness and discouragement; the God of all grace, who has excited this fear of him by preventing grace, will assuredly afford him the means of instruction, and enable him to profit by them: so that eventually, he shall dwell at ease, or lodge in goodness; and shall find a never-failing source of comfort in the divine love, whilst he expects the complete felicity of heaven at last. The inheritance of Canaan was a type of heaven; but indeed that man inherits the earth as far as it can profit him, who has food and raiment, and lives contented, and in peace: and the godly man may hope for these blessings in behalf of his children, when about to leave them.

V. 14. The knowledge of the glory and harmony of the divine perfections, which encourages a sinner to trust and love a holy God; that sweet communion, which the believer enjoys with his Saviour; and that peace and those joys, which spring from the earnest of the Spirit, may be well called "The secret of the Lord;" and they lead the soul into a conciliating and satisfactory acquaintance with his purposes, and the wisdom and equity of them; and with the security and blessings of the new covenant, and the assurance of an interest in it. But none, except those who fear God, can possibly enjoy this satisfaction, which must still remain a secret to all ungodly men.—Several other discoveries of the secret plan and purposes of God may also be intended, which none but the pious Christian can receive. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 16. The word rendered desolate is the masculine of the noun, which, being feminine, is translated my darling. (xxii. 20.) The Septuagint here render it, only begotten; as it certainly means in some places: but in this connexion it seems rather to imply the destitute condition of the Psalmist, when left alone, or forsaken by his former adherents and friends: and a fit type of Christ, as deserted by his disciples, and surrounded by his insulting enemies.

V. 17—20. Every occurrence during Absalom's rebellion tended to augment the distress of David, especially as reminding him of his sins, which were thus visited on him, as Nathan had foretold. (2 Sam. xii. 10, 11.) He therefore united reiterated prayers for pardon, with his earnest requests for deliverance. He was aware, that even his own son and his bosom counsellor, and a vast multitude of the nation, thirsted for his blood; and would decline no violence, treachery, or cruelty, to destroy him: so that his life could only be preserved by the same divine power and mercy, in which he trusted for the salvation of his soul.

V. 21. In the sight of God, David pleaded guilty of many and great sins: but he had acted an upright part towards his unnatural son and treacherous subjects. As a penitent likewise, he was without guile; was determined to adopt no sinful measures for his preservation: and thus waiting on God, he trusted that he should be preserved.

PSALM XXVI.

David professes his integrity, and delight in the people and ordinances of God, with a solemn appeal to him, 1—8. He deprecates the doom of the wicked, and unites earnest prayers

V. 22. The cause of the royal sufferer was that of the nation, and of true religion. While he was banished from Jerusalem, the people were oppressed, the wicked triumphed, and piety languished: and if the traitors succeeded, the event would exceedingly tend to obstruct the best interests of Israel. David, therefore, in this prayer for the redemption of Israel from oppression, was a type of Christ interceding, amidst his personal sufferings, for his church; and for his own exaltation, as indispensably necessary to her interests, and to the salvation of his elect people.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—7.

In vain will our voice be lifted up in prayer, unless our souls be lifted up to God in fervent desires, and believing expectations. They who trust in the Lord, will never be ashamed of their hope: nor shall any boasting or menacing enemies triumph over them. They will wait continually upon the Lord with their humble desires, and wait his time of granting them: and whilst others have the benefit of their prayers, thousands are praying for them, by character, if not by name; their heavenly Advocate also presents his effectual intercessions; and a cause so pleaded cannot but prevail; as they who injure or hate them, without cause or provocation, will at length experience to their unspeakable shame and confusion. But we must be careful not to give our enemies so much as a plausible pretext for their malice: and for that reason should above all things be instant in praying to be guided in the ways of truth and holiness. The most wise and experienced feel most their need of this continual teaching, and are most desirous of it: not only lest they should be wholly deceived, but lest they should be seduced into any paths of error or iniquity. They will therefore wait all the day on the God of their salvation. And his tender mercies, and his love to his people of old, will encourage them to come to him, that they may be remembered in the same gracious manner.—Recent transgressions or chastisements, if they had a proper effect, must lead most of us to recollect, and with shame confess, the sins of our youth, which are thus remembered against us; and thus we may humbly hope that the Lord will remember us according to his mercy, and blot them out for his goodness' sake.

V. 8—22.

The most ignorant or atrocious sinner may properly be encouraged to trust in our gracious God, who in perfect sincerity invites all who hear to come to him. He delights in directing the sinner in the way of acceptance, and the believer in the paths of holiness: and when the heart is humbled, and the rebellious will subdued, the understanding shall be further enlightened to perceive the truths of God. The sinner, who has learned, in meek and humble teachableness, to sit at the Saviour's feet and hear his word, shall soon be made acquainted with the secret comforts of true godliness, and shown the nature and excellency of his everlasting covenant: and having acceded to it, and learned to walk with him in faith and obedience, according to its tenour, he shall find every one of the Lord's dispensations towards him to be unmingled truth and mercy, not excepting his sharpest trials and severest corrections. The sudden recollection of the greatness of his iniquity may often assail his confidence; but faith in the Lord's more abundant mercy can even convert that into an argument why he should pardon. Pride, obstinacy, and the love of sin, dictate all the complaints which are heard of difficulty and uncertainty, in discovering the truth and will of God: for wherever there is a man who truly fears the Lord, he shall certainly be taught by the Holy Spirit the safe and happy way. He will surely be directed to the Saviour, and there find rest to his soul; and reposing his care and confidence upon his reconciled God, he will cheerfully wait for more complete joys in heaven; and commit his children to the Lord, desiring his blessing for their inheritance. That we come short of this serene and happy life, is the effect of remaining unbelief and disobedience, and because we are so often heedlessly running into the snares of the world, and are thus caught by Satan's wiles. Let us then look more entirely to God, that he would pluck our feet out of every net, and preserve us from every entangling care. Let us pray most earnestly when we are most desolate of earthly comforts and comforters, or oppressed with sorrows: for the Lord is able to support and deliver us. He considers the number and cruel hatred of our enemies; and if either the malice of man or the temptations of Satan render our prayers more frequent and fervent, they will be of great service to us. Let us especially pray for integrity and uprightness of heart, which will be our best preservative from dangers, delusions, and temptations; and secure to us purer comforts and more solid advantages than the friendship, or even the possession, of the whole world. And whilst we wait on the Lord about our own concerns, let us remember our brethren in tribulation, and pray for them also, that they may be redeemed from all their sins, enemies, temptations, and troubles; and that the Church of God may be enlarged and prospered, and fill the whole earth.

and indeed it seems very probable that this psalm was written by David, in Philistia.—Exposed to envenomed slanders and cruel persecutions, he had been driven from the ordinances of God, into the society of idolaters: but he appealed to Him who searcheth all hearts, to judge betwixt him and his enemies. He was conscious of having uniformly and perseveringly acted uprightly towards Saul, and in all other respects: and he had also trusted in God alone. He therefore was confident he should not be left to fall into any of the snares which were laid for him. Or, he trusted in the Lord to keep him from falling, in any subsequent season of temptation.

V. 2. Try. This word, in the original, is derived from the fire, with which metals are tried and purified: and it shows the earnest desire of the Psalmist, even by sharp trials, to have his character ascertained, and his holiness improved.

V. 3. By meditating on the kindness, mercy, and faithfulness of God, David had learned to copy them in his habitual conduct. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 4. Dissemblers here denotes hypocrites, or those who under specious pretences cloaked their unjust and malicious designs.

V. 5. Evil doers meet together for various purposes; but whether treacherous policy, or malignant enmity, or a sensual and festive indulgence, formed the bond of their union, David hated their company, and shunned their assemblies.

V. 6-8. By repentance and conscientious obedience, as well as by faith, expressed in attending on the typical purifications, the Psalmist purposed to prepare for offering those sacrifices which prefigured the atonement of Christ; and especially for presenting his thank-offerings for deliverance, which he anticipated with cheerful hope. He trusted, that he should soon be restored to the land of Israel, and to the courts of God, in which he greatly delighted: and while the worshippers compassed the altar, he purposed to celebrate the wonderful works of God in his behalf.—The glory of God was manifested at the sanctuary, from above the mercy-seat; and in those ordinances which typified the Redeemer. Thus the tent, where the ark was placed, might be considered as the house of God, in which his honour dwelt; where he met his worshippers and blessed them, and was glorified by them.

V. 9-11. As the Psalmist thus had by choice separated from the wicked, he trusted that God would distinguish between him and them; especially referring to Saul, Doeg, and others, who gave or received bribes, in order to murder him and his pious adherents; and who were a kind of prefiguration of Caiaphas, Judas, and the false witnesses and wicked priests, who combined to murder the Prince of life. But though conscious of integrity, and determined to persist in it, David trusted only in the redeeming mercy and grace of God.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

According to that covenant which Jesus mediated, the man who “walketh in his integrity,” yet wholly trusts in mercy and grace, is evidenced to be in a state of acceptance: the Lord may be appealed to, to plead his cause, and he shall not slide, but “be kept by the power of God through faith unto salvation.” This man desires to have his inmost soul searched and proved to the uttermost. He is aware of the deceitfulness of his own heart; and desires to detect and mortify every sin; and he longs to be fully satisfied that he is a true believer. He examines himself; and is willing to be examined by the penetrating and distinguishing word of truth: but, lest after all he should be deceived, he appeals to the great Searcher of hearts; and, in his better judgment, welcomes even those fiery trials by which his graces may be manifested and improved, as gold and silver in the furnace. Whilst he hopes in the loving-kindness and faithfulness of God, he sets them before him as his example, and desires to be conformed to the holy truths which he believes. He is conscious that the society of profane, licentious, deceitful, or dissipated persons is become irksome to him. He does not frequent the haunts of evil-doers; and will stay no longer in worldly company than he can help. But he rejoices in the opportunity of attending on the ordinances of God, and meeting with his people. With serious preparation of heart, and in the exercise of repentance, faith, and a good conscience, he approaches the table of the Lord, to enjoy fellowship with him and his disciples; and to publish with the voice of thanksgiving, and to tell of all the wonders of redeeming love. Having loved the courts of the Lord, and every place and company, where his praises were displayed, and his glorious truths discoursed on: he would dread above all things the doom at last of wicked men. A few hours with the covetous, malicious, and deceitful, are very painful: eternity in such company would form a hell to him. This antipathy gives just confidence that his soul shall never be gathered with them, and animates him still to walk in his integrity, and to cry for mercy and complete redemption. Thus he feels his ground firm under him: and as he delights in blessing God with his congregations on earth, he trusts that shortly he shall join the great assembly in heaven, in singing praises to God and to the Lamb for evermore.

NOTES.

PSALM XXVII. V. 1—3. It is probable that this psalm was composed by David, in the extremity of his danger from Saul, in order to silence the fears of his companions, by showing them the strength and reasonableness of his confidence: though some think it relates to his subsequent conflicts and dangers. However that were, JEHOSHAPHAT himself was his “Light,” his Teacher, Guide, Comforter; “and his Salvation,” both from temporal dangers and eternal misery: he was “the Strength of his life,” his powerful Protector and Upholder: and therefore he had no reason to fear any enemies. When in former instances his wicked persecutors had come against him in force and rage, as if they meant to devour him, they stumbled and fell; and he was assured they would do so again: and being confident that God was on his side, was determined that he would not yield to fear, even if a whole army should march in battle array, to wage the most desperate war against him. (Compare this with the complaint of Saul. 1 Sam. xxviii. 15.) When the wicked enemies of Christ came to seize him in his deepest humiliation, at one word of his they went backward and fell to the ground.

V. 4—6. David was conscious that the service of God was his choice, and, as it were, his element. Though a brave soldier, a renowned commander and conqueror, and an anointed king; yet his one desire above all others, and constant prayer and persevering endeavour was, to dwell in, or at, the tabernacle of the Lord, where his ordinances were administered, which were typical of the promised Messiah and his salvation, means of grace to believers, and acts of worship to God. If he might choose for himself, he would spend all the days of his life in the courts of the Lord; that he might meditate with joy upon the beauty and glory of the divine perfections there displayed, and have constant opportunity of inquiring the will of God, by the high-priest, and from his word; and that he might take shelter as in the pavilion of his heavenly King, where no enemy could find him, or would dare to approach him. Thus he hoped to be fixed as on a rock, immovable by changes or assaults. Indeed, though now driven from the courts of God, he was assured that he should at length be exalted above all his enemies; and be brought back again to the Sanctuary, when he would offer sacrifices of joy and thanksgiving, with animated and triumphant songs of praises and gratitude.

 12 ^b put not thy servant away in anger : ' thou hast been my help ; ^c leave me not, neither forsake me, " O God of my salvation.

10 When ^d my father and my mother forsake me, then ^e the Lord will * take me up.

11 ^f Teach me thy way, O Lord, and lead me in ^g a plain path, because of mine enemies.

12 Deliver me not over unto ^h the will of mine enemies : for ⁱ false witnesses are risen up against me, and such as ^j breathe out cruelty.

13 ^k I had fainted, ^l unless I had believed to see the goodness of the Lord
 in the land of the living.

14 ^m Wait on the Lord : ⁿ be of good courage, and ^o he shall strengthen thine heart : wait, I say, on the Lord.

V. 8. This verse may be literally rendered, " My heart said unto thee, Seek ye my face. Thy face, LORD, will I seek." In retired meditation, the exhortations of God to the sons of men to seek his face or favour, were recollected by the Psalmist: and his heart answered, ' Dost thou deign thus to invite us? Then without delay, or hesitation, I will seek thy face.'

V. 9. ' Do not in anger reject my suit, because I am a sinner, but accept it because I am thy servant, whom in former times thou hast so often relieved, that I am emboldened to beseech thee not to desert me,—but to give me deliverance and safety.' (Bp. Patrick.) David expected eternal salvation from the tried mercy and truth of the God of his salvation; and this gave him confidence as to temporal deliverances.

V. 10. Perhaps David's parents died about this time, or he was deprived of the solace of their company. Perhaps he meant, in general, that the favour of God would compensate the loss of all earthly friends; that the Lord would surely prove faithful, though his nearest relatives should prove cruel and treacherous; and that he was determined to stay his mind on God alone.

V. 11, 12. The Psalmist knew himself to be constantly beset with spies and false witnesses, who pried into all his actions, in order to find some handle against him; that they might gratify their cruel malice under the pretence of justice: and all this led him to pray frequently for heavenly wisdom, and that God would lead him in the path of uprightness, and at a distance from the appearance of evil; that so his observers might be disappointed. Thus the Son of David, also, was continually watched, that some accusation might be found against him: but his perfect ho-line and wisdom completely frustrated and confounded his implacable foes, who thirsted for his blood.

V. 13. This verse may be rendered, " Assuredly, I trust to see the goodness of the LORD," &c. Perhaps some person had asked David, How he kept up his spirits under his manifold trials and dangers? and he gave him this answer, as comprising the whole secret of his cheerful confidence. " The land of the living," in this connexion, seems to imply a prospect beyond this present dying world.

V. 14. Some understand this verse as the Psalmist's apostrophe to his own soul: but perhaps it was chiefly intended as an exhortation to his discouraged companions in tribulation; and also as a pious counsel to every believer who might read this admirable psalm.

12 Deliver me not over unto ^m the will of mine enemies: for ⁿ false witnesses are risen up against me, and such as ^o breathe out cruelty.

13 ^p I had fainted, ^q unless I had believed to see the goodness of the LORD
 in the land of the living.

14 ^r Wait on the LORD: ^s be of good courage, and ^t he shall strengthen thine heart: wait, I say, on the LORD.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

He who is "the Light of the world" is the eternal JEHOVAH: and whosoever followeth him shall not abide in darkness, but shall have the light of life. He will guide every believer into the knowledge of his truth and the comforts of his salvation; and into an acquaintance with the dangers, snares, and enemies, which beset his path, and the manner in which they are to be avoided and overcome.
 He will uphold and protect their souls, and their lives also,
 as long as that is good for them; and he will keep them by his power through faith unto complete salvation. Happy are they whose faith and hope are as vigorous as their security is valid. They need not fear armies of hostile assailants, or legions of infernal spirits, united for their destruction with rage equal to their force. In this they may be confident; for the eternal God is their refuge. The temporary success of the wicked is only an introduction to their deeper disgrace and misery; they shall soon stumble, and fall, and rise no more: and the trials of believers will terminate in everlasting honour and felicity. Let us then entreat the Lord to give us faith, and to increase our faith; that we may be delivered from tormenting fears; and honour our Protector by cheerful composure, when the hearts of others are shaken, as the trees of the wood are moved by the tempestuous wind. But the believer's confidence is distinguishable from the hypocrite's presumption. Whatever be the Christian's rank, expectations, reputation, or employment, he considers the favour and service of God as his "one thing needful." This he prays for and seeks after: (for what is heartily desired will be diligently sought.) He devises, if he can, to dwell near the ordinances of God, that he may have constant access to them; for they are the rest of his soul, to which he returns with pleasure when he hath necessarily been called from them. He delights in contemplating the beauty and glory of the Lord, in the person of Jesus Christ; and he inquires his will, by studying his word and praying for his teaching Spirit: and he hides himself from cares, and fears, and foes, in the presence-chamber of his King and Father, where no pursuer can discover him, or will venture to assault him: and whilst he drinks the waters which flow from the Rock of ages, he fixes his hope and soul upon the Rock itself, for stability and support. With such desires and experiences, we may triumph amidst conflicts, and rejoice in tribulation. The Saviour, who suffered and conquered for us, will conquer by us: and in hope of retribution.

dering eternal songs of praise in the temple above, we may now celebrate every mercy with sacrifices of exulting joy and thanksgiving here on earth. But we should all be far more joyful and thankful, if we were more instant and fervent in prayer. To the blessings of salvation the word of God invites sinners at large: yet instead of attending to this call to seek his face, men turn their backs on him and his ways: for the heart of him alone, who is born of God, echoes to the invitation: he fears nothing so much as the hiding of his face, and being excluded from his service, or left to come short of his salvation: every token of his displeasure grieves him; and this renders him watchful and jealous of his own heart, and animates his supplications. The loss of earthly friends, or their unkindness, or anxiety about them, leads him more diligently to seek, or more highly to value, a relation to his heavenly Friend: and should his attachment to the Lord forfeit the favour of all his relatives, that loss would prove his richest gain. Let then the destitute, the orphans, and the widows, seek to the Lord, who is "a Father of the fatherless," and he will take them up; let us all seek to be taught and led in his ways, and in a plain path, that we may neither wander nor stumble, nor cause our enemies to rejoice: and if we meet with the envenomed tongue of slander, or with cruel persecutions, let us remember the man after God's own heart; or rather, let us look unto the suffering Saviour, and pray in faith not to be delivered up into the hands of our enemies. Having found the supports and comforts of the Lord's favour in times past; let us not faint, but "verily hope to see his goodness in the land of the living." Let us encourage others to wait for the Lord, and not to yield to fear in the midst of dangers and enemies; for his grace will be sufficient for their support and deliverance. And whatever we may meet with in this dying world, he will strengthen our hearts; and we shall see and enjoy his goodness in the land of the living; in heaven, where sin and death never entered. Let us then, I say, encourage each other to wait on the Lord with patient expectation, and with fervent prayer.

NOTES.

PSALM XXVIII. V. 1. It is not agreed, whether this psalm was written during David's persecutions from Saul; or at a later period of his life.—The words rendered the pit, generally mean the grave, when used in this manner: yet when the death of the wicked is thus expressed, it seems also to denote the place of future punishment: for all men go down into the grave; but the wicked into "the pit of destruction." (lv. 23.)—If God did not show, by some visible interposition, that he heard and answered David's prayers; he must soon be cut off and laid in the grave, never more to glorify God on earth; and it would appear, as if he died under the divine wrath, as the wicked do.—Had Christ continued in the grave, it might have been concluded, that he had been justly put to death: but he was justified and proved to be the Son of God by his resurrection.

V. 2. Holy Oracle. The place of the ark of the covenant, and the mercy-seat.

V. 3. Draw. Or, Drag me not away! as criminals are violently carried to the place of execution. David deprecated the doom which awaited his deceitful persecutors, or that of Saul in particular.

V. 4, 5. The language in the first of these verses is that of prayer, in the latter of prediction. In the one, the Psalmist calls on God to deliver him, and plead the cause of true religion, by executing deserved punishment on his implacable enemies: in the other, he assigns the reason, why he used this language; namely, because he foresaw this doom coming on them, and because their conduct showed them to be given up to final hardness of heart. In general we may and ought to pray for the just punishment of all impenitent enemies of the church; but with particular application to individuals, such prayers can only be proper for inspired persons. To be dealt with according to his deservings, must be dreadful to every sinner.

V. 6, 7. This sudden transition, from earnest prayers to exulting joy and praise, accords so much to the method and power of his voice, 3—9. And that, as the eternal King, he will of those psalms, which are evidently prophetic of Christ, that some expositors interpret this of him; and suppose these verses to be spoken as an anticipation of the triumphs and glory which followed his deep humiliation and sufferings. David himself, however, seems frequently to have anticipated the answer of his prayers in a similar manner: or, perhaps, after his deliverances, while leading the praises of his people, he contrasted the joyful scene, with the dangers and sorrows, the prayers and tears, which preceded it.

V. 8. Some versions render this, “The LORD is their “Strength: (that is, that of his people,) and his Messiah “is especially the Strength of salvations.” The original may bear this construction: and no doubt David had reference to Christ, whom he typified both in his conflicts and victories; and the blessings of God conferred on his people through him.

V. 9. David’s prayer for Israel was a kind of type of Christ’s intercession for his church. The authority of a good prince resembles the care of a tender shepherd over his flock. The word rendered feed, therefore, means also rule: and is applied to JEHOVAH, to the Messiah, and to David. (Marg. Ref.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

Whilst others are troubling their fellow creatures with unavailing complaints, believers should, under their distresses, cry the more earnestly to the Rock of their salvation: and they should not rest till they have received some satisfactory token that their prayers are heard; for if the Lord could refuse to answer them, their case would resemble that of those who have perished in their sins, to whose agonizing cries no gracious answer will be made for ever. But this can never befall those who come to the mercy-seat of a reconciled God, in the holy place not made with hands; through the intercession of our great High-Priest, sincerely desiring and humbly hoping for those blessings, which he purchased by his meritorious sacrifice, and is now exalted to bestow. They will not, however, merely deprecate the punishment of the wicked, and the effects of their persecuting malice; but likewise earnestly pray that they may not be drawn away by their enticements, to adopt their errors and imitate their sins: for the ungodly are more to be dreaded, when they speak peace to their neighbours, than when they avow the mischief which is in their hearts. We may without hesitation predict, that impenitent sinners will ere long be recompensed according to their endeavours to do evil; and we cannot desire that the obstinate enemies of Christ should escape condign punishment. Indeed, if men duly regarded the works of the Lord, the displays of his power and majesty would intimidate them from rebellion; and his goodness would lead them to repentance: but alienation of heart from God causes men to neglect all his operations, and to despise even his redeeming love. And he will surely destroy such as do; and not build them up, though for a time they prosper. The servant of God is often encouraged to anticipate the answers of his prayers, whilst he is yet asking: when praising him for his goodness, and “rejoicing with joy unspeakable and full of glory;” it is very profitable to recollect and record our earnest cries in the time of our distress: and whilst our hearts rejoice in the Lord, our Strength and Shield, we should not forget our brethren in tribulation, but pray fervently for them also. In the exaltation of our anointed King, who was once crucified for us, we have the earnest and exemplar of all our deliverances. In his name we may present our supplications in full assurance of hope, that our God would save his people, and bless his inheritance; that he would protect, provide for, and comfort them on earth, and at length lift them up for ever in heaven. But what are all those sudden transitions from deep distress to joyful praises, which take place in the believer’s experience here, compared with that, which every one successively finds, when in a moment he exchanges the groans and agonies of death for heavenly joys and uninterrupted hallelujahs!

NOTES.

PSALM XXIX. V. 1, 2. The Psalmist here calls on the mightiest princes of the earth, who demand homage, and sometimes worship, from men, to render glory to the universal Sovereign and Judge; and to come and pay their tribute of adoration at his sanctuary, in which he displays the beauty, and excellency of his holy character and perfections.

10 The LORD ⁸ sitteth upon the flood; yea, the LORD sitteth [‡] King for ever.

11 The LORD will ^u give strength unto his people; the LORD will ⁸ bless his people with peace.

V. 3—11. It is probable that this psalm was composed during a violent storm of thunder and lightning, which reminded David, and led him earnestly to remind others, how mean and feeble the most mighty and honourable of the earth were, in comparison of the God of "glory and strength." "You," (ye princes of the earth,) "think 'there is great power in your words: but as they can be 'heard but a little way, so they are but of little force, in 'comparison with this mighty voice; wherein the Lord 'expresses how potent he is, and strikes a dread and horror 'into all that hear it.' (Bp. Patrick.) The thunder is often called the voice of God: (Marg. Ref.) During a violent storm, he seems in glorious majesty to ride upon the many waters which form the clouds, and he shakes the ocean as well as the earth. The power of the lightning equals the terror of the thunder: enormous cedars are shivered and scattered by it, in a moment: the very mountains shake, and seem to move with agility, like a calf or a young rhinoceros, by the tempest or the earthquakes with which they are sometimes accompanied. The flames of the electrical fire, at the direction of the Almighty, are divided with inconceivable swiftness and irresistible force; and even the wilderness is thrown into a trepidation. The hinds affrighted cast forth their young: and the forests are stripped, and their dark recesses laid open; the trees being shivered, their branches torn off, and the wild beasts affrighted in their dens. The clause rendered, "the hinds 'to calve,'" is by some read, with a small alteration of the text, "the oaks to tremble." But the people who worshipped God at his sanctuary, heard his voice from his word, which, though replete with encouragement, was more majestic and powerful than the thunder and lightning; and being secure under his protection, they spake of his glory, as displayed in all these terrific events. For He who once directed the rising, continuance, and conclusion of the deluge, in the time of Noah, and who always bounds and directs the boisterous ocean, rules every tempest, and is established King for ever: and he will give protection, support, and peace with every blessing to all his faithful people.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The mighty and honourable of the earth derive all their power and splendour from the eternal JEHOVAH: but, alas, few of them attempt to render to him the honour of his name, or to worship him in the beauty of holiness! They should, however, be reminded, that this is their highest privilege, interest, and happiness. The most exalted creatures indeed cannot render to the infinite God, their Creator and constant Benefactor, all the glory which is due to him, much less can any sinner: but when we come before him, as "in Christ reconciling the world unto himself," adoring his majesty, submitting to his authority and righteousness, in genuine repentance and faith, and offering our spiritual sacrifices of praise and thanksgiving, and willing obedience; he will pardon and accept our defective services, though infinitely beneath his majesty and excellency. The majestic terror and destructive effects of thunders, lightnings, hurricanes, and earthquakes, with the consternation which they occasion, while they impress on us a sense of God's omnipotence, and of man's impotency, should lead us to think of the defenceless and desperate condition to which the wicked will be reduced in the day of judgment.—For the voice of the divine law, if duly attended to, would fill the consciences of sinners with more terror and amazement than all the convulsions in nature: and the effects of the word of God, when attended by the operations of his Holy Spirit, are far greater upon the souls of men, than that of thunder in the material world. By its energy the stoutest are made to tremble, the proudest are abased, the secrets of the heart are detected, sinners are converted, and the savage, the sensual, and the unclean, become harmless, gentle, and pure, resembling doves and lambs. If we have heard his voice, and fled for refuge to lay hold of the hope set before us: if we have welcomed Christ as a Saviour, and submitted to him as our King for ever: if, relying on his merits, we are no longer terrified by the ministration of death, yet have learned to love him and keep his commandments: let us remember that it is the same glorious God our Saviour who causeth the thunder; and the children need not fear their Father's voice, when he speaks in anger to his enemies. Whilst they tremble who are exposed without shelter to his vengeance: let us in his temple, his appointed refuge, (safe as Noah in the ark,) thank him for our security, and speak of his honour. "Let us give diligence to the full assurance of 'hope unto the end;' and continually plead his promises, expecting that he will give us strength to resist temptation, to bear trials, to conquer enemies, and to perform every duty; and that he will bless us with a quiet conscience, a contented mind, and the "peace of God, which passeth

NOTES.

PSALM XXX. Title. This title may be rendered “A Psalm: a song at the dedication of the house for David.” When advanced at the throne, and possessed of Mount Zion, the Psalmist built himself a house, which no doubt he dedicated to God, by fervent prayer and joyful thanksgivings, and perhaps by making a religious feast for his friends. But there is nothing in this psalm peculiarly appropriate to that occasion: and it was evidently composed either after a dangerous illness, or when he had experienced some extraordinary deliverance.—Many think, that it was used after Absalom’s rebellion, when David returned to Jerusalem: and having purified his house from the defilement which had polluted it, he solemnly dedicated both it and himself to God. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 2. Healed. If this word be literally understood, a dangerous illness and an unexpected recovery, gave occasion to the psalm. But some think the expression to be used figuratively, (as no doubt it frequently is;) and to denote a forlorn and hopeless condition, like that of a sick man given over by physicians, and unable to help himself. The expectation of David’s enemies of his death; and the joy and triumph which that event would have given them, peculiarly suit the state of things during Absalom’s rebellion.

V. 3. (Notes, xvi. 10. xxviii. 1.)

V. 4. Saints. “This word signifieth them that have received mercy, and shew mercy liberally to others.” Several words, varying in meaning, but all implying genuine piety and holiness, are translated saints in different parts of Scripture. By persons of this character, the holiness of God, (or his moral excellencies, as displayed in his word and by his works,) is reflected on with admiring and grateful love, and celebrated with joyful praises.

V. 5. The concise manner in the original of this verse is very expressive. “For a moment in his anger; life in his favour; weeping may lodge in the evening; but singing in the morning.” No doubt this is meant exclusively of weeping penitents, or submissive suffering believers; and not of the ungodly or hypocritical. “See his clemency to his faithful servants! whom he may correct sharply for a little while: but is soon reconciled, and then extends his favour to them without any end; and sends deliverance to them so suddenly and unexpectedly, as well as seasonably; that where nothing but lamentations were heard over night, there nothing but shouts of joy are heard in the morning.” (Bp. Patrick.)

V. 6—8. When the Psalmist had been delivered from Saul’s persecuting malice, and was settled peaceably in his kingdom, and rendered victorious over the enemies of Israel, he seems to have concluded that his trials and dangers were over, and that he should thenceforth have uninterrupted peace. But, while he ascribed his great prosperity, and the firm establishment of his authority, to the faithfulness, power, and love of God, he seems to have given way to unwarranted confidence, and to have remitted his vigilance and activity, and probably the fervency of his devotion. Thus he was gradually drawn into a course of inexpedient indulgence; and at length into most aggravated guilt, in the matter of Uriah, which threatened the final ruin of his comfort, reputation, authority, and family; and actually exposed him to sharp rebukes, anguish of spirit, and overwhelming domestic afflictions; till Absalom’s rebellion formed a sort of crisis in his case; and reduced him to such a humble, submissive, believing, and devout state of mind, as prepared him for returning peace and comfort. The Lord “hid his face and he was troubled:” his deepest trouble, however, was but for a moment: his weeping, when both sins and sufferings combined to render him inconsolable, continued for a night, and joy came in the morning: God, in answer to his prayers, "restored to him the joy of his salvation;" and he spent the rest of his days in a degree of prosperity, honour, and comfort, which in so dreadful a case was beyond what could at all have been expected.

V. 9, 10. If God had permitted his offending servant to be slain, or to die of disease, he could no more have served the cause of religion, or glorified him in his church on earth: but if spared, he purposed to celebrate the mercy and truth of God among his people, and hoped thus to do essential service to Israel. The concluding part of the first book of Chronicles, shows that his purposes and expectations were fully established.

V. 11, 12. These verses illustrate the doctrine of the fifth verse by the Psalmist's own experience: whose case seemed as likely to form an exception to the general rule, as any that could well be conceived. The figurative language used on the occasion, is highly descriptive of the most exulting gladness, and most animated, constant, and unmingled praises; such as are found in the six concluding psalms.—The tongue, when thus employed, is the distinguishing honour of our animal frame; and seems to be meant by my glory.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

We ought to dedicate all our possessions and enjoyments to Him who gave us them; our habitations should be daily intrusted to his care, and consecrated to his service, by the word of God and prayer; and by excluding from them, as far as we can, whatever is displeasing in his sight. And when our comforts have been interrupted, and are again restored, we should renew our dedication of them to the service of our God. But, alas, how many houses, even of men called Christians, are not only destitute of religion, but are also scenes of such impiety and wickedness, that one might almost be led to conclude, that they had been set apart to the service of the devil!—In this militant state it calls for our admiring gratitude, when the Lord lifts us up out of one difficulty after another, and does not suffer our foes to rejoice over us. Returning health, or deliverance from imminent dangers, is peculiarly pleasant, when given in answer to fervent prayers. But the redemption of our souls from the pit of destruction calls for our greatest thankfulness; and he, who heard the Saviour, and raised him from the dead, will thus save and bless all his true disciples. Let us then praise God for that earnest of all our mercies and hopes, and call upon all the saints to join us in our hallelujahs. They may rejoice at the remembrance of his holiness: for as the Lord hateth sin, and hath taught them to hate it, his purity assures them, that he will wholly sanctify them, and all his perfections afford security for their eternal salvation. His anger, which is everlasting against the impenitent, endureth but for a moment. He will frown, rebuke, and correct when they offend, and then they will mourn and repent; and this may continue for a night, but joy will speedily return: and the renewed sense of his favour, which is their life and comfort, like the rising sun, makes it morning with their souls.—But let all beware of unwarranted confidence and carnal security: neither outward prosperity nor inward peace are here immovable: the Lord in his favour hath fixed the believer's safety him as the deep-rooted mountains; but in every thing else he may expect to be shaken, and to meet with temptations and afflictions. When we grow unwatchful, we fall into sin; and the Lord hides his face, our comforts droop, troubles assail, and perhaps our enemies insult over us. And to arise from such depths requires redoubled earnestness and diligence; renewed humble confessions and fervent importunate prayers. We should entreat the Lord, that we may not close our lives under his frown, in a way dishonourable to his name or unprofitable to our brethren; and we may properly pray to have our lives spared, that we may yet praise him on earth and declare his truth. In this way our comforts will be again restored; the penitent's sackcloth will in due time be changed for the robe of salvation, and the garments of praise; and our tongues will be our glory, being employed to the glory of our God. But indeed the continuance of life, and even that of our bodies in the grave, will be but as a moment, compared with eternity; and whatever may befall us by the way, or however we come to the end of our course, if we have learned to love and praise God on earth, we shall exult in his favour, and give him thanks for ever.

NOTES.

PSALM XXXI. V. 1. It may be supposed that David wrote this psalm, to encourage himself and his friends, during his extreme danger of being seized on by Saul, when he fled from Keilah. (1 Sam. xxiii. 23—28:) or that he recollected his prayers, and meditations, and confidence, after his extraordinary deliverance, and thus recorded them, for the honour of God and the encouragement of his people: and we should realize these circumstances, which precluded all hope of escape by ordinary means, if we would enter into the spirit of the Psalmist, and perceive the strength of his faith and confidence in God. But David, in his greatest dangers and trials, expecting deliverance from God, was only a feeble type of the Saviour, in his extreme sufferings, his deep humiliation, and his prospect of the joy set before him.—The clause, rendered “Let me never be ashamed,” is literally, “I shall not be ashamed for ever.”

V. 2—4. David and his men had taken shelter in some natural strong hold formed by a rock: but he was fully aware, that this hiding place or house of defence, now it was surrounded by Saul's army, must rather prevent than aid his escape. As, however, he had been used to make “the name of the Lord his strong tower;” and as he considered the honour of the divine power, righteousness, and truth, engaged on his side; he felt a confidence that he should be rescued by some extraordinary interposition of God. Yet the case was urgent; and therefore he earnestly prayed to be answered speedily: and to be led and guided out of the intricacy in which he was enclosed by his persecutors. For they had, as it were, caught him in a net by stratagem; and he had neither sagacity nor power sufficient to rescue himself out of their hands.

V. 5. Our blessed Saviour adopted the first clause of this verse when expiring on the cross: and many things in the psalm may be applied to him; yet David evidently perceived himself to be in such constant danger, that he could have no security either to his life or soul, but by thus day by day intrusting them to the powerful and faithful hand of God.—Christ omitted the latter clause of the verse, which more properly relates to the type than to the antitype.—All the deliverances of the church, and of believers of old, were earnest of the redemption made by the death of Christ, and wrought with reference to it: and the merciful deliverances which the Psalmist had received, encouraged him still to confide in “the LORD God of truth.”

V. 6. Lying vanities, or, The vainest of vanities, may denote the idols in which the Gentiles confided, and to which Israel was extremely propense: but the expression seems likewise to mean, all attempts to obtain information or assistance from those who had familiar spirits, or in any way practise sorcery and witchcraft, which in fact was one of the worst sorts of idolatry. Perhaps David observed a disposition among his adherents, in times of extreme danger, to have recourse to expedients of this kind: but he thus expressed his abhorrence of the practice, and his determination to stand aloof from all who were guilty of it, and to admit no trust but in God alone.—Saul, (it is probable,) afterwards hastened and aggravated his own awful doom, by “regarding these lying vanities.” (Note, 1 Chr. x. 13, 14.)

V. 7, 8. The original, in the beginning of these verses, is future; “I will be glad and rejoice in thy mercy:” and to conceive of the Psalmist in the crisis of his danger, thus anticipating his deliverance and his joy in the mercy of God in it, gives the passage a peculiar animation. His gracious God had often before this regarded him under his deepest depressions, and so noticed or owned him in trouble and danger, as to permit no enemy to take away his life. He had repeatedly been in the power of the enemy, as to all human probability: yet God had not shut him up in it, but had constantly delivered him: and he trusted he would still do the same.—Or this may be the language which David anticipated that he should soon use, concerning his present alarming situation, when confined in a cave and surrounded by his fierce persecutors.—Thus Christ seemed to be left in the power of his enemies: but, in the extremity of his sufferings, he anticipated his resurrection and the joy set before him.

V. 9. The Psalmist's present feelings seem to have interrupted the full exercise of his faith and hope. Such a succession of dangers, and hardships, and provocations, tended to depress his spirits, make his eyes languid, injure his health, and prey upon his vitals.—Some suppose; that entire want of provisions was added to the rest of his difficulties; so that he and his men were ready to die with hunger.

V. 10-13. The life of David, while persecuted by Saul, was one continued series of afflictions and sorrows, except as he rose above them by faith and communion with God. It must be supposed, that he felt his sufferings with great sensibility: and while dejected and weakened under them in body and mind, his former sins were brought to remembrance, and he considered himself as visited for them.—Not only did his enemies reproach him, but his neighbours, his friends and relations, eagerly joined the senseless clamour! Every one was afraid of seeing him, and shunned him in the streets or roads, for fear of being involved in his ruin. His case was thought hopeless: and he was no more regarded than a dead corpse, or a broken earthen vessel, which never can be repaired. Numbers, and those principal men, sought favour by slandering him; all from fear declined speaking in his behalf: while his powerful enemies plotted together on the best method of killing him. The marginal references will show how each of these circumstances was still more emphatically observable in the history of the divine Saviour, when he became “a man of sorrows,” and “despised and rejected of men.” One circumstance indeed must be excepted: he was wounded for our transgressions, but had no iniquity of his own.—This passage seems to mark out the crisis before mentioned as the date of the psalm: but as events not wholly dissimilar occurred during Absalom’s rebellion, after David had brought great guilt on his conscience, in the matter of Uriah; some expositors apply the several expressions to Shimei’s reproaches, Abithophel’s counsel, and the other particulars of that eventful period.

V. 14. “I have said, Thou art my God;” that is, “I

‘have determined to seek all my salvation, my present security and comfort, and my eternal happiness, entirely from thy omnipotence and all-sufficiency, and in thy mercy, truth, and unchangeable love, as revealed in thy word.’

V. 15. The Psalmist well knew, that the times of his troubles and deliverance, and the continuance and period of his life, were entirely at God’s disposal: and as he would not attempt to anticipate the Lord’s appointed time by killing Saul, he was persuaded that Saul could not succeed in his attempts to slay him; and that infinite wisdom and love would bring about his deliverance and advancement to the throne, when the proper season was arrived. Thus the counsels and decrees of the Jewish rulers against our Lord were continually disappointed for several years, because his time was not yet come.

V. 16. ‘Till my time of deliverance, let thy manifested presence and favour cheer my heart and protect me, for the honour of thine abundant mercies.’

V. 17, 18. These verses also are future, ‘JEHOVAH, I shall not be ashamed, for I have called on thee. The wicked shall be ashamed; they shall be silent in the grave,’ (or in the place of separate spirits.) “Let the ‘lying lips,’ &c. This way of expression certainly implies prayer, as well as prediction: but it is the language of triumphant confidence in God, and assurance, that however urgent dangers or powerful enemies or temptations may be, the event shall be happy and glorious: and thus considered, it is perfectly justified from the charge of malevolent imprecation; unless foreseeing and predicting the destruction of the wicked be malevolence. The word righteous is singular; it especially marks David’s strict integrity, while slandered with insolent contempt; as typical of the Just and Holy One of God, who was reviled far more haughtily and despitefully.

V. 19, 20. David, in the midst of his troubles and imminent perils, found encouragement in admiring the goodness of God to those whom he had taught to fear and trust in him. Many effects of this goodness are openly shown "before the sons of men," in the deliverances wrought for his servants on earth: immensely more is laid up for them in heaven for their eternal happiness. Here the Lord preserves them by his powerful presence from their proud and envious foes, as in a secret hiding place: and he will keep them, as in a royal pavilion, from all the effects of those slanderous reproaches which are cast on them by those who contend with them and persecute them.

V. 21. Perhaps David here referred to his deliverance, when Saul intended to have besieged him in Keilah: or he considered God's protection as the strongest fortress.

V. 22. In my haste. This seems especially suited to the hurry and agitation of the Psalmist's mind, and the imperfection of his faith, when he found himself environed by his powerful foes in the cave to which he had fled for shelter. Before he had time for reflection and prayer, he hastily gave up all for lost. But meditation on the promises God had made to him, with earnest supplication, calmed his soul: and eventually his prayers were answered.

V. 23, 24. The deliverance of David, so far exceeding all human probability, might well encourage all that had experienced the mercies of God, to cleave to him in thankful admiring love; for it was evident, that the Lord preserved believers in every danger, and punished decidedly and awfully, all their proud and ungodly persecutors. No circumstances of danger or temptation, therefore, should deject them, or drive them from the path of duty; and in adhering to God, they would find their hearts supported and comforted with inward strength.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—8.

The consciousness of trusting in God for every thing upon the warrant of his word, inspires confidence in danger, and suggests pleas in prayer: for it would not be honourable for the Lord to leave those who rely on him to be ashamed of their hope. His justice induces him to deliver them from their unrighteous persecutors: his mercy through the Redeemer's righteousness, will rescue them from final condemnation; and their earnest prayers will draw down promised blessings from their reconciled Father as they stand in need of them. The Lord will protect and support all who flee to him as their Fortress, and build upon him as their Rock of salvation: for the honour of his name he will guide such as desire to be led in his holy ways: and He will extricate from perplexities, and deliver out of temptations those that call upon him, to pluck their feet out of every net and snare, which Satan and wicked men have privily laid in their path. Every true Christian, having learned the worth of his soul, and the dangers to which it is exposed, hath been led to intrust it as a sacred deposit to the care of the Almighty; but considering His holiness and justice, and his own guilt and pollution, he would not dare to do so, did he not behold him as in Christ his Redeemer, ready to forgive, and true to his covenant and promises. Thus encouraged, he continually commits his spirit into his hands, and by daily experience obtains a more firm persuasion of his power and willingness to save: and therefore, when death either seems to be at hand or actually comes, he has confidence in renewing this often repeated transaction, and he desires to die resigning his spirit into the hands of his redeeming God. (2 Tim. i. 12.) But they who desire this comfortable assurance, must abhor the fellowship of all such as regard lying vanities, and renounce all idolatrous, superstitious, and carnal confidences, on which so many depend. They must rejoice only in the mercy of God; and in every affliction remember that he considers their trouble. They should treasure up for future use their experiences of his having noticed, supported, and comforted their souls in adversity, and having delivered them, when they thought they had been shut up in the hands of their enemy: for every deliverance is an earnest of the complete enlargement of the heavenly world.

In this present world we expect heavy trials: yet it is our infirmity, "if our life be spent with grief, and our years with sighing." Should pain, sickness, poverty, reproach, contempt, and persecution, come upon us with combined force: should our foes prevail and our friends prove unfaithful, or afraid of owing or regarding us: should any be so degraded from honourable or useful stations, as to be forgotten like a dead man, or thrown aside as a broken vessel: should enmity unite with contempt, and slanderous accusations give countenance to conspiracy against our lives, we ought to remember that we have deserved more than all this, and be thankful for deliverance from the wrath to come. We should also consider the man after God's own heart, and the treatment which he experienced: and especially we should look unto Jesus, who was divinely wise, holy, and merciful; yet was more hated, despised, slandered, and afflicted, than we can be. Let us then follow the example of his resignation; remembering "that our times are in his hand;" and that support, comfort, and deliverance, will be vouchsafed whenever he pleases: nor can any suffering befall us otherwise than our Father has appointed. Whilst we therefore give ourselves to meditation and prayer, we may profitably observe how the lying lips of Saul, Doeg, Ahithophel, and Judas, were put to silence in the grave: and thus will all be confounded, who menace, slander, or speak grievous things contemptuously against the righteous. Instead of yielding to impatience or despondency under our troubles, we should turn our thoughts to the surprising goodness of the Lord towards those who fear and trust in him. For whilst their treasure is laid up for them out of the reach of all their enemies, their bodies, souls, reputations, and comforts are under the protection of the Almighty; and they are kept as in a strong city, through faith unto salvation. We should not therefore yield to unbelief, or hastily conclude, under discouraging circumstances, that we are cut off from before the eyes of the Lord: but ask, and he will hear and deliver. He will preserve his faithful people through life; and when they meet the stroke of death, and yield their bodies to the grave, Jesus will receive their souls, and raise their bodies, and bring them to be for ever with him in glory. Let all his saints therefore pray to be enabled patiently to suffer, and courageously to venture for his sake: for he will comfort and strengthen the hearts of all who hope in him; whilst the proud despiser of his Gospel and persecutor of his people, shall meet with an abundant recompense of his evil deeds, and be for ever shut up, without possibility of release, in the hand of his cruel enemy, and in the unquenchable fire. Lord pardon our complaints and fears; and increase our faith, patience, love, and gratitude; and teach us to rejoice in tribulation, and in hope of thine eternal glory!

NOTES.

PSALM XXXII. Maschil. This title seems to imply, that the psalm contains peculiarly important instruction: and indeed it teaches the way by which miserable sinners become happy, and the nature and effects of true repentance: but as twelve other psalms have the same title, the subjects of which are very different; some have thought that the word maschil showed the music to which the psalm was set. This is one of the seven penitential psalms;

and, though the special occasion of it is not mentioned, it is generally supposed to refer to David's sin in the matter of Uriah, and his subsequent repentance. It seems to have been written some time after the fifty-first, and when God had "restored to him the joy of his salvation."

V. 1, 2. Sin is the only cause of misery; and forgiveness is the commencement of a sinner's happiness: as he that had obtained the king's pardon would be allowed to be the happiest, though the poorest, in a company of condemned malefactors. The believer's transgressions of the divine law are all forgiven, being covered with the atonement. Christ bare his iniquities; and therefore they are not imputed to him, as to any of their penal consequences: nay, "righteousness without works" is imputed, and as a righteous person the reward is adjudged to him: hence all his present comforts, and hopes of future felicity. (Note, Rom. iv. 5—8.) But his character, as well as his privilege, is emphatically marked: "in his spirit there is no guile." His professed repentance, faith, and love are undissembled: he means what he says, when he confesses his sins, and prays to be delivered from them. He is no hypocrite or formalist in his worship, but is indeed the same before God that he appears to be before men; a sinner trusting in his mercy through the atoning blood, and seeking sanctification by the power of the Holy Spirit. He does not profess to repent, with intention to sin again; nor indulge in sin because God is ready to forgive. Others will, but he cannot thus abuse the doctrine of free grace: he is "an Israelite indeed, in whom there is no guile."

'Happy, thrice happy, is that man, to whom God will be pleased, out of his own free grace and mercy, (for no man can merit such a favour by any services we can do him,) to remit not only his common errors, but also his grossest sins.' 'Who doth not only seem by his sorrowful confessions to hate and abhor them; but is unfeignedly resolved to forsake them.' (Bp. Patrick.)

V. 3—5. It seems that David, before Nathan came to him, had often been exceedingly tortured in his conscience, on account of the atrocious crimes which he had committed; yet reluctance to humble himself before God, or to be considered as a criminal by men, led him to keep silence, or only to give vent to his anguish by solitary bemoanings, ('roaring as a lion that has received a deadly wound:') and endeavouring, no doubt at the same time, by one sophistical excuse or other, to palliate his guilt to himself, and to be on better terms with his conscience. But this stubborn and rebellious conduct served only to prolong and enhance his misery. His secret remorse and conflict not only preyed on his spirit, but impaired his health, and rendered him infirm in his bones or limbs, as through old age. Neither business nor pleasure during the day, nor his couch by night, could relieve his inward anguish, which was rendered more exquisite by the pains taken to conceal it. Thus the hand of God was heavy upon him: and it is probable, some additional distressing malady was superadded to the natural effects of his inward conflicts; so that he, who was before vigorous and healthy, wasted away, till he resembled the parched land in the drought of summer. But at length, being brought to a more proper frame of mind, he resolved humbly to submit himself to God, and to make full and ingenuous confession of his aggravated crimes, without attempting any excuse or palliation; having done this, the iniquity or injustice of his sin was pardoned, his burden was speedily removed, and at length his comforts were restored; and he recorded all this with a mark of peculiar emphasis, Selah, that others might profit by his painful and his joyful experience; (Notes, Luke xv. 14–24.)

V. 6, 7. The word rendered godly is sometimes translated a saint, and seems to mean one whom God favours. All that fear him, and, in humble submission, desire his mercy, show so far that right state of heart which springs from special grace: and such persons, hearing how readily God forgave the heinous guilt of David, when he was brought to ingenuous confession and deep repentance, would be encouraged to copy his example, and learn to pray in faith and hope, "in a time when God might be found." While his word is brought home to the conscience, and the Holy Spirit strives with the sinner by painful convictions and terrors, or draws him to hope for mercy; it is especially a time of finding, "an acceptable time," "a day of visitation," a critical season in his experience. In some respects, this life is a time of finding, except to such as are judicially hardened: but in another world, God will no more be found on a mercy-seat, waiting to be gracious: but as an avenging Judge to all the repentent. They however who, as David supposed, would by his example be animated to seize the invaluable opportunity, were received into favour; and secure of protection, (like Noah in the ark, during the deluge,) could be approached by no overwhelming troubles, temptations, or enemies; or by those judgments and vengeance which overtook the wicked and hurried them into destruction.— In this happiness the Psalmist rejoiced; and he daily received so many mercies, which he celebrated with songs of deliverance, that he was compassed about with them.

V. 8–11. David in the name of God, here proposed to instruct those who would regard him; and by his experience and attention, to show them the way of happiness; keeping his eye still upon them and consoling them. Or, the Lord himself by his prophet, promises to be the Teacher and watchful Guide of all, who desire to walk in his ways. When horses or mules prove refractory and mischievous, force and skill are used to subdue and restrain them: and they are exposed to much severe discipline, to render them tractable, and to prevent them from doing mischief, instead of service, to their possessors. Thus obstinate sinners, in as irrational a manner, render sharp usage necessary, either to preserve them from ruin, or to restrain them from injuring others. So that their sorrows are multiplied, as the deliverances and praises of the righteous are enhanced.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

All men would be happy: but they vainly expect that riches, pleasures, and worldly honours, can confer satisfaction; and when disappointed, they change one vanity for another: so that he, and he alone, who attends to God's word, seeks felicity successfully. The mercy of God, through the great Redeemer, revealed in the Scriptures, brings the first report of the sinner's happiness; faith receives this report, renounces worldly idols and false confidences, and seeks forgiveness and righteousness in the Saviour's name. But pride and stoutness of heart, aversion to God and his holy character and spiritual worship, and unbelief, either absolutely, or to a considerable degree, prevailing in the heart; keep back from unreserved submission, ingenuous confession, and fervent prayer, numbers who are deeply distressed with a sense of guilt. They keep silence, and brood in secret over their terrors and sorrows, which they endeavour to conceal under an assumed and hypocritical cheerfulness; while in solitude they feel and sometimes mourn over their misery with horror and remorse, in the most doleful lamentations and fruitless wishes. In this way some are at length driven to despair and suicide: but far more seek relief from a condemning conscience, by having recourse to infidelity, or some corrupt system, which excuses or explains away the evil of sin; and so enables them to keep up a delusive hope of being happy, or at least of escaping misery, without repentance and works meet for repentance. When, however, God is pleased to visit the soul with his special grace, he sends his word, not only by a Nathan to the outward ear, with "Thou art the man;" but by his Holy Spirit to the inmost soul: and then godly sorrow, unfeigned submission, ingenuous confessions, and believing prayers for mercy and forgiveness through the atoning blood of Christ, soon make way for hope, and peace, and joy: and the justified believer tastes a happiness, of which before he had no conception; while he expatiates in praise of his present consolations, as contrasted with his preceding anguish, in a strain not unlike the encomiums on health of one recovering from a dangerous disease. Now he would have all his fellow-sinners hear of his happiness, that they may come and share it: and therefore he freely declares his own sentiments and experience for their instruction: and his character is equally distant from that of the self-confident Pharisee, and the licentious Antinomian. Yet even this man may relax his vigilance, and fall into grievous sins, and even be led to keep silence, in the same perverse and foolish manner that he did before! So deceitful is the heart of man, and so powerful the influence of temptation operating on human depravity!—But lengthened and multiplied miseries here, or eternal ruin hereafter, must be the inevitable consequence of this mad contest of a worm against Omnipotence. Our God is indeed far more ready to forgive, than we are humbly to seek his mercy; but he will continue to frown, to rebuke, and to correct, till his children kiss the rod, confess their sins, and implore forgiveness. Then he will rejoice in pardoning and comforting them; that they may feel, and so declare to others, the difference betwixt a humble and an unhumiliated frame of mind. His "goodness should lead all men to repentance:" but this is by no means the case; for numbers despise the riches of his mercy; and even his offending children are often kept from humble prayer, by unbelieving discouragements. But the examples of those who have found mercy, again excite their hopes. Then they pray, and the Lord hears from his mercy-seat, and they will be safe from the floods of vengeance, which await those who will not "seek the LORD while he may be found;" but all who come to him in this way, shall be preserved from their enemies and rescued from their troubles; and their tears of godly sorrow shall be turned into abundant songs of joyful praise. Having tasted the bitterness of sin, and the comfort of forgiveness, they can warn and instruct their fellow-sinners, and teach them by their experience: and the Lord himself will guide with his eye every humble penitent. But with his powerful hand will he restrain, and with his heavy hand will he punish, the obstinate and refractory; while all the sorrows that can be endured on earth are as nothing, compared with the misery of the wicked in the world to come. Happy then are they, who trust in the Lord, and uprightly walk with him: mercy surrounds them, and joy is their portion; the ways in which they are called to walk are ways of pleasantness and peace; and the end is eternal life. "This is the heritage of the servants of the LORD, and their righteousness is of me, saith the LORD."

NOTES.

PSALM XXXIII. V. 1. Neither the writer, nor the occasion of this psalm, is mentioned: but it is generally ascribed to David, and may perhaps be considered as a continuation of the subject begun in the preceding psalm.—"God and not the world, is the fountain of joy which sinners talk of, but the righteous only possess." (Horne.)—Joy and praise are becoming, when united with piety and integrity; but the appearance of them, without soundness of character, is inconsistent and disgusting.

V. 2, 3. Instrumental as well as vocal music in the worship of God, preceded the ceremonial law: not being explicitly there appointed, they can be no part of it; and if properly conducted, may be rendered greatly subservient to devotion.—"Let not ancient songs of praise suffice you; but endite a new hymn, to testify your singular love and gratitude; employ your best skill to make the sweetest music; and sing as cheerfully as you are wont to do at your solemn feasts." (Bp. Patrick.)

V. 6. (Marg. Ref.) Most of the ancient expositors, by the "Word of the Lord, and the breath," or Spirit, "of his mouth," understand the Son of God the personal Word, and the Holy Spirit, as proceeding from the Father and the Son, (Notes, Gen. i.)

V. 7. The waters, which at first covered the earth, were by the Creator's power confined within their prescribed bounds, as if laid on a heap, or reserved in storehouses, to be dispersed, as required, to supply the want of all that dwell on earth, by various methods of communication.

V. 9. The sublimity of this verse is admirable. "He spake, and it was; He commanded, and it was established." He did but signify his pleasure, and the thing was done, and each of his creatures took the station allotted to it.

V. 10-12. The sovereignty of God, in providence, accomplishing his purposes whether of mercy or judgment, without the least impediment from the politic counsels of blind idolaters or impious persecutors; nay, by overruling their plans to fulfil his designs, which extend through all generations of men, from the creation to the end of the world, shows his omnipotence and omniscience, as much as the first creation of the world did. The 'counsels of states and empires are either directed to the accomplishment of the great counsel of heaven; or if they attempt to thwart it, are blasted and brought to nothing. History will force all who read it with this view, to acknowledge thus much. And with this view indeed it should always be read.' (Horne.) The nation, therefore, which was distinguished as the chosen inheritance of this almighty Creator and universal Sovereign, possessed inestimable advantages above the worshippers of idols; and should rejoice in them and improve them.

V. 13-15. The Lord, who formeth all hearts as one, and impartially decides concerning the works of all, is the Witness as well as Judge of every man's conduct, throughout the earth. 'He formed their souls as well as their bodies; and therefore must needs see into their hearts, and be perfectly acquainted with every one of their thoughts.' (Pp. Patrick.) He also made the human species originally of the same nature; all are derived from the same stock, and all receive that nature impaired through the fall. The hearts of men, like their faces, have the same grand outlines, which are diversified through a variety of concurring circumstances: and the one heart, (the same views, judgment, disposition, and affections,) is given to all who are renewed by the Holy Spirit, with merely circumstantial differences, in things of smaller consequence.

V. 16, 17. The marginal references to a few scriptural instances, sufficiently explain these verses: and the Almighty can effect the same things by ordinary means, as he formerly did by miracles.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

Rejoicing in the Lord as our Father and Friend, is the genuine effect of humiliation and mourning for sin: for being justified by faith, and walking uprightly before him, joy is our privilege and duty. It becomes us to abound in cheerful praises; it is suited to our character, and ornamental to our profession, and honourable to God. But the joy of the hypocrite springs from presumption, and his prayers are an offence and affront to the Lord. Every endowment we possess should be employed with all our skill and earnestness, in the service of the Giver; and

NOTES.

PSALM XXXIV. Title. (Notes, 1 Sam. xxi.) Achish was the name of this king of Gath; and Abimelech, which signifies, My father the king, seems to have been a general title given to all the kings of Philistia, as Pharaoh, and afterwards Ptolemy, was of the Egyptian kings.—'This 'psalm is curiously composed, according to the number 'and order of the letters of the Hebrew alphabet, in the 'beginning of each verse; which shows that it was con- 'trived when he, (David,) reflected on his escape, in some 'place of safety.' (Bp. Patrick.)

V. 2. Whilst the Psalmist publicly declared the power and goodness of God in delivering him from extreme danger, and gloried in him as his omnipotent Father and Friend, he rejoiced to think, that other pious persons in distress would be raised above discouragement, and filled with cheerful hope by this record of his experience. The event during almost three thousand years, has fully verified this expectation.—The word rendered humble, is afterwards translated poor. (6.) It seems applicable either to poverty and affliction borne with meek submission; or to the lowly sense which true believers have of their unworthiness, and poverty in spiritual things, which renders them teachable, dependent, and thankful.

V. 4—6. When the Psalmist understood that he was considered, in the court of Achish, as the enemy of the Philistines who was now in their power, his fears were very great, as the method by which he sought to extricate himself clearly shows. He was, however, delivered; and ascribed his escape to a peculiar interposition of God; which the more encouraged his faith and hope. And he realizes to himself the effects of these events on others, who would look to God in distress and danger, or 'flow unto him,' and find comfort and safety; while they conversed together on the case of David.

we should be avowed in our worship: but well regulated and heavenly affections are most harmonious and acceptable.—Every part of his word is holy, just, and good, and useful to the upright; and all his works are done in truth, correspond to the prophecies and promises of the Scripture, and are, one way or other, a fulfilment of them.—Although the Lord delighteth in righteousness and judgment; yet the earth, which is full of man's wickedness, is also filled with his goodness: yea, his most abundant mercy consists perfectly with his most awful justice. The formation of the earth, and the separation of the waters in the ocean as a vast reservoir for the use of man, proclaim the wisdom, power, and goodness of the Creator: and as they encourage the believer to expect the largest blessings from his Almighty Friend, they call on all the inhabitants of the earth to stand in awe of, and to fear his tremendous indignation. For as "He spake, and it was done," when the world was made, his mandate will be equally efficacious, when he shall command the destruction of his enemies: and such are all who will not have the Saviour to reign over them. All human power and policy are ineffectual against his omnipotent will: "his counsel shall stand, and he will do all his pleasure;" and his vengeance against the ungodly will be everlasting. But blessed are his people, who have him for their Portion, and are his chosen inheritance, who worship and serve him, live under his protection, and enjoy his favour! We possess the outward means of this blessing: may he visit our souls with salvation, and new create us unto holiness! For he, who formed man's heart, cannot be imposed upon by any appearances.—All confidence, except in his mercy, is vain. Powerful armies, personal strength and valour, or the force and speed of a horse, are unavailing for outward safety, without his protection. The event of battles and the fate of kingdoms are determined by his sovereign will, who considereth the works of men, and acteth with perfect wisdom and justice. All human devices are ineffectual for the salvation of our souls: but the Lord's watchful eye is over those who unite the conscientious fear of his name, with a believing hope in his mercy through the great Redeemer. He will preserve their lives, and supply their temporal wants as far as is good for them:

8 ^p O taste and see that ^a the LORD is good : ^r blessed is the man that trusteth in him.

9 O ^a fear the LORD, ye his saints : ^r for there is no want to them that fear him.

10 ^a The young lions do lack, and suffer hunger : but ^a they that seek the LORD shall not want any good thing.

11 [¶] Come, ^y ye children, hearken unto me : ^a I will teach you the fear of the LORD.

12 ^a What man is he that desireth life, and loveth many days, ^b that he may see good ?

V. 8. (Note, 1 Pet. ii. 1—3.) The experience, which faith makes way for, of the Lord's faithfulness and goodness, may be compared to the evidence received by the senses concerning their respective objects. The believer tastes and sees, that God is good, as he perceives that honey is sweet, the light pleasant, and the landscape beautiful. This is no longer a matter of reasoning or expectation; but of actual enjoyment, in which he cannot be deceived. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 9, 10. 'God is never wanting to provide for his servants, what he seeth needful and best, in matters temporal; while tyrants and oppressors, who are in the world what lions are in a forest, are often, by the just judgment of heaven, reduced to want that which they have ravished from others.' (Horne.)

V. 11—14. The Psalmist, having addressed the saints, or such as were established in the way of holiness, next exhorts young persons, or new converts, as children or sons, beloved sons. Though a person of high rank, renowned for military valour and success, appointed to be a king, and eminent in music, poetry, and every accomplishment, he was desirous of teaching children: for youth is the learning and remembering season; and what first occupies the mind lasts the longest. He did not, however, attempt to teach them music, poetry, arts, or arms, but 'the fear of the LORD,' its nature and effects. He had been showing the blessedness of those who feared God, and he wished his young friends to share these blessings.—Many as his engagements, and great as his difficulties and dangers were, he would spare time and find spirits to teach children the fear of the Lord.—The manner in which the apostle quotes this passage, demonstrates that such exhortations are perfectly consistent with evangelical principles. (1 Pet. iii. 10—12.) True religion begins in the fear of God, in dread of his anger, and hope and desire of his favour; and hath the promise both of this world and the next. Whether men would live long and happy on earth, or for ever in heaven, the tongue must be bridled; profane, licentious, slanderous, flattering, proud, and deceitful language must be refrained from; all sin must be repented of and renounced; every duty attended to; peace with God, and peace with all men must be pursued: indeed the grace of God, that bringeth salvation, effectually teaches men to attend to these things; and the contrary conduct will ensure temporal and eternal misery: without them faith is dead; by them it is evidenced to be living and justifying.

V. 15—17. The Lord takes special notice of his people's wants, difficulties, and prayers; and watches over them with unremitting vigilance, proportioning the communication of his strength and consolations to their need of them. But he sets himself decidedly against the impenitent: and his frown alone is sufficient to sink them in misery and ignominy. 'The death of martyrs is their deliverance; and the greatest of all deliverances.' (Horne.) This is true of the death of every believer, by whatever means effected: then 'the Lord delivers him out of all his troubles.'

V. 18. The broken in heart and contrite in spirit, in the language of Scripture, are not those who, being weighed down by sorrows and sufferings, through impatience and despondency, sink under them: but such as are broken-hearted under a sense of their sins, and led to renounce all self-confidence. Their stout, hard, and unfeeling hearts, are humbled, softened, and made sensibly alive to the feelings of remorse, fear, shame, godly sorrow, and self-abhorrence. Their self-will also is subdued; they submit to God, but without plea or hope, save in his mercy and grace. They are prepared to welcome his Gospel, and exclusively possess its blessings.

PSALM XXXV.

David prays that God would fight against his enemies; and anticipates their confusion and his triumph over them, 1—10. He complains of their ca-

lummy, malice, and ingratitude, blending supplications and appeals to God, 11—22. He renews his prayers and predictions, 23—28.

V. 20. God so preserves the believer, in the most perilous circumstances, that not a bone is broken without his Father's wise and merciful appointment; nay, "the hairs of his head are all numbered," and not "one falleth to the ground, without God." Every thing subserves his final good, and both soul and body will be preserved and perfected for glory. Not a bone of the Saviour was broken at his crucifixion; though it was customary to break the bones of crucified persons, and the two thieves had their legs broken.

V. 21, 22. Desolation means final destruction, whether of nations as such, or of individuals. The desolation of the several kingdoms, which have persecuted the church, and that of the Jews who crucified the Saviour, "hating that righteous one," with the preservation ensured to true Christians, form a striking exposition of these verses.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

It is our duty to bless the Lord at all times, in pain, sickness, poverty, persecution, and even in the agonies of death: he is always worthy of our love and praise; we are always receiving more good from him than we have deserved; and the viler we are, the more cause have we to adore his condescending goodness to us. It encourages the humble believer, and silences the proud Pharisee, when the servants of God are enabled to rejoice and make their boast in him, in circumstances of extreme danger, and the deepest distress: and if our faith were strong, we might thus call on all around us to magnify and exalt our God with us, extolling his glorious excellences, and celebrating the praises of his mercies. Whilst others consider how one poor tempted soul has been comforted and delivered, they too are encouraged to look unto him, and their hearts grow cheerful, and their faith gathers strength. But we should especially look to Him, "who, though he was rich, for our sakes became poor;" and remember how he suffered, and how he is glorified, in order to save all that trust in him. They must be safe and happy, who fear the Lord. The holy angels minister to them, yea, the great Angel of the covenant encampeth continually around them, to protect and deliver them. Oh that sinners would but make trial of his love! Their own experience would convince them, that the blessings of salvation are sweeter than all the pleasures upon earth. But even the saints need exhortations to the reverential fear of God: the more humbly and obediently they walk with him, the happier they are: and they who seek first the Lord and his kingdom and righteousness, shall never want any good thing; whilst the covetous and rapacious, who resemble ravenous beasts, shall at length be left utterly destitute. Let then all, who have themselves tasted that the Lord is gracious, take delight in leading others, and especially the young, into these happy ways; not thinking this service beneath them. Let young persons set out in life with learning the fear of the Lord, if they desire true comfort here, and eternal happiness hereafter; for they will be the happiest, who begin the soonest to serve so good a Master. But let them attend to him, who speaketh unto them as unto children, that they may learn the true fear of God, and beware of counterfeits. That religion promises best, which begins with the conscience, and creates a watchfulness over the heart and tongue; a dread and hatred of hypocrisy and all sin, and a love of peace and universal holiness. Such a temper of heart prepares the way for the proper understanding and reception of divine truths; and they who thus receive, will adorn the doctrine of God our Saviour; he will peculiarly regard them and attend to their prayers; whilst he fights against the evil doer, whatever be his profession; and oblivion or infamy will be his present and eternal portion. Nothing is more essential to true godliness, than a contrite heart, broken off from every kind of self-confidence and self-preference, and crushed down into the dust of self-abasement: in this soil every grace flourishes; and to this contrite person nothing can give encouragement, but the free mercy of the Gospel of Jesus Christ. Such meet with many afflictions for their trial and profit; but the Lord will deliver them out of them all; whilst the ungodly will sink under one trouble after another to rise no more; for evil shall slay the wicked. He that accomplished the prophecies concerning the Saviour, so that not a bone of him was broken by all his furious enemies, will take equal care of all his faithful servants, and destroy all their persecutors. He will redeem his people from hell and from the grave, and will not forsake them who trust in him, till they possess a happiness large as their capacities, durable as their immortality, and surpassing their highest expectations.

NOTES.

PSALM XXXV. V. 1—3. 'This psalm, we are sufficiently informed by the matter of it, was penned by David, when he was fiercely persecuted by Saul, whose forces, which were unjustly raised against him, he beseeches the Lord to dissipate; and especially to stop the mouth of his false accusers, such as Doeg and the Ziphites.' (Bp. Patrick.) 'So long as Saul was an enemy to David, all that had any authority under him, to flatter their king, (as is the course of the world,) did also most cruelly persecute David.' It is likewise evident, that the Psalmist was led by the Holy Spirit to speak of his own case in language which was more emphatically applicable to the divine Saviour and to his sufferings. 'Albeit God can with his breath destroy all the wicked; yet the Holy Ghost attributeth to him all these outward weapons, to assure us of his present power.'

V. 4—9. These verses in the original run entirely in the future tense, as a prediction: though they stand in most translations and paraphrases, ancient and modern, in the imperative mood, as an imprecation. No doubt there are many instances in which such denunciations stand in the form of petitions; and, considered as the language of inspired men, respecting the inveterate enemies of God and Christ, and religion, no reasonable objection can be made against them. It does not, however, seem desirable, to understand any passages in this strong sense, which naturally express one of more general application. The verses under consideration are simply a prediction, that David's enemies would, by their unprovoked, assiduous, and crafty devices to take away his life, bring on themselves the deepest infamy, along with unexpected and inevitable ruin: and that his trials would terminate in thanksgiving and rejoicing. As light chaff cannot resist the force of the wind; so the Psalmist's persecutors would not be able to withstand the power and justice of God; whose angels encamped around the righteous to protect them, and would drive their dismayed and bewildered assailants headlong into the pit of destruction. One in particular, (probably Saul,) would perish in that very destruction which he had intended for

David. He took counsel to take off David in battle against the Philistines, and he died in battle against them; which made way for the Psalmist's complete deliverance. In like manner, Ahithophel and Absalom brought ruin on themselves, by their counsel against David; and so did Judas, and the Jewish rulers, and the nation, by opposing Christ; of whom David, in this psalm especially, seems to have spoken, as a type or representative. Indeed the whole Scripture predicts the final ruin of all the impatient enemies of God and religion, and that of Satan, their great leader: and the intercession of Christ, the prayers of his church, and the ministration of angels; while they tend to complete the salvation and joy of his people, concur in accomplishing the prophecies on his enemies. 'A traveller, benighted in a bad road, is an expressive emblem of a sinner walking in the slippery and dangerous ways of temptation; whilst an enemy is in pursuit of him, whom he can neither resist nor avoid.' (Horne.)

V. 10. The Psalmist frequently complains, under his trials and chastisements, of broken bones, that his bones waxed old, &c. (Marg. Ref.) because his whole frame was sensibly affected. In like manner, he considers himself, in body as well as in soul, so revived by his deliverance, that every bone would concur in admiring his Deliverer and his unrivalled excellence. Christ was raised from the dead, so that not one of his bones was broken: every member of his mystical body, shall be forth-coming at the general resurrection: and every believer now has, and shall then have, cause to praise the Lord for taking care of his soul and body, in every part and in all respects. Saul was too powerful for poor David; Christ was made poor and a man of sorrows, and had no armed force to oppose to the power of the Jews and Romans; and Satan and other enemies are too strong for the believer.

V. 11, 12. The very persons, whom David had befriended when he was in prosperity, after he had been proscribed by Saul, bore cruel witness against him, and demanded that punishment should be inflicted on him for alleged acts of treason, of which he had not the least consciousness. This was still more emphatically accomplished in the great Antitype. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 13, 14. The Psalmist here contrasts his conduct, in respect of his persecutors, with that towards him of the very persons to whom he had rendered the most important services.—The nature of fasting, as an occasional voluntary act of self-abasement, submission to God under adverse dispensations, sorrow for sin as the cause of sufferings, and self-discipline in order to self-government, is illustrated by the expression, “I humbled,” or afflicted, or chastened, “myself with fasting.”—The conduct of the Psalmist’s foes showed, as he feared, that his prayers for them had not been answered; but he was satisfied, that at length they would return into his own bosom. The original is future: and as he was still conflicting with trials, and anticipating deliverance, the future best suits his case.—David thus mourned over the afflictions of Saul and of Israel, with fasting and prayer: and Christ wept over Jerusalem, and fasted, prayed, and suffered for sinners, as for a friend, a brother, or a parent; and he prayed for his crucifiers, when about to expire amidst their cruelty and contempt. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 15, 16. When David was persecuted by Saul, they that before envied him rejoiced; the most abject persons, from whom he had least expected it, or who were too obscure to be known by him, conspired to do him mischief, (as if the lame should ridicule a man for halting:) his name was torn with incessant reproaches and false accusations: he was their sport at feasts; whilst they who were maintained by diverting the company, and personating and turning to ridicule the characters of their neighbours, made him their constant subject: yet their contempt was united with most cruel and desperate rage.—All this was more emphatically true of Christ, and the treatment with which he met from the hypocritical Jews, and from the

V. 17—19. (Note, xxii. 21, 22.) The exact agreement of the language used in these verses with that of the passage referred to, favours the opinion that this psalm also is a direct prophecy of the Messiah. The Psalmist, however, seems evidently to have spoken of his own concerns, though carried beyond himself by the Spirit of prophecy, to use language applicable to far more important transactions.—Translating the nineteenth verse in connexion with the context, gives it additional force. “I will praise thee among much people.—Mine enemies shall not wrongfully rejoice over me, or they wink with the eye who hate me without a cause.” It is the language of assured faith and hope, rather than of either prediction or imprecation.—The original is future.

V. 20. ‘They are men of a turbulent spirit, that give not their sovereign peaceable counsels, but devise false stories, to incense him against such as would gladly serve God quietly, under his government, without doing the least harm to any body.’ (Bp. Patrick.) ‘David would have lived quietly under the government of Saul; our Lord did not aim at temporal government;—nor did the primitive Christians intermeddle with the politics of the world; yet all were betrayed, mocked, and persecuted, as rebels, and usurpers, and pests of society.’ (Horne.)

V. 21, 22. They boldly accuse me as a traitor,—saying, so, so, we have found him out, his treasonable practices are discovered, we ourselves are eye-witnesses of it.’ (Bp. Patrick.) The appeal of David to God, the ever-present witness of his conduct, and the prayer grounded on it, have a peculiar energy, when viewed in this connexion. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 25—28. All these verses are in the future tense, and in my opinion, (which I offer with very great diffidence and hesitation on such a subject, and in opposition to almost all versions, ancient and modern,) are more expressive, and lie less open to objection, when thus translated. No doubt the other rendering accords to the idiom of the language; yet it is by no means necessary, and what is lost by thus rendering the original most literally? “Judge me, O LORD my God, in thy righteousness; and they will not rejoice over me. They will not say in their hearts, so would we have it:” (it is as our souls desired;) “They will not say, We have swallowed him up. They will be ashamed and confounded together, that rejoice in my shame. They will be clothed with shame and dishonour, that magnify themselves against me. They will shout for joy and be glad, that favour my righteous cause,” &c. The twenty-eighth verse is literally rendered; and the others might with equal propriety, and I think with more energy, be translated in the same manner: and though the clamours against David, as cursing his enemies, when considered as an objection to the Scriptures, is irrational; for it assumes the point in question, and determines that he spake in his own spirit, and not as moved by the Holy Spirit: yet it is not desirable to give occasion even to irrational and impious objectors. (Marg. Ref.)—How applicable is the whole passage to the Saviour’s sufferings and triumphs, and to the consequences of them!

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The believer is admitted into a covenant of friendship with his God: and they who strive with him fight against his omnipotent Ally; whose presence and assistance will more effectually defend his servants, and annoy their persecutors, than the most powerful hosts of well-armed valiant men. If he say to our souls that he is our Salvation; if he show us that our sins are pardoned and subdued, we have nothing to fear, but may confidently predict the confusion and ruin of every seducer, or persecutor, who seeks to destroy our lives or souls, or in any way to do us hurt. We must not desire the ruin of any enemies, except our lusts, and those evil spirits who would compass our destruction: yet we ought fervently and constantly to pray for the desolation of all the inveterate enemies of Christ our anointed King. Assuredly they will at length be thrown as chaff into the fire, and driven in a dark and slippery path by the angels of God into the bottomless pit; and their crafty and unwearied enmity against the holy Jesus and his harmless followers, will involve them in unexpected and inevitable misery. Let then the persecuted and afflicted believer rejoice in the salvation of the Lord. His preservation is ensured by the Saviour’s resurrection and exaltation; who will shortly change our vile bodies, and make them like his own glorious body by his Almighty power: then all our bones shall, as it were, praise our deliverer, who hath rescued us poor and needy sinners from sin, Satan, and death; enemies far too strong for us. Whilst in faith we anticipate this glorious event of our trials, let us prepare for the cross in this world. When we consider the ingratitude, contempt, and hatred, with which the holy Jesus was treated in return for his unspeakable love; when we remember how the multitudes, who had witnessed or even shared his benign miracles, rejoiced in his adversity; how the very abjects collected round his cross, insulted him, and even gnashed their teeth at him; and how the Scribes and Pharisees treated his sacred person with blasphemous ridicule and mockery, whilst they were hypocritically observing the feast of the passover, as if zealous for the honour of God and religion; when we meditate on those scenes, we shall not marvel if the world hate us; if we be despised, abused, reviled, falsely accused, and treated with indignity and ingratitude by those whom we have most loved, and could not have suspected, and who even profess to serve God. Let us then learn to possess our souls in patience and meekness; like the Saviour, let us persevere in praying for and doing good to our enemies: and acting towards them with compassion and affection, in hopes of overcoming evil with good. If this have not the desired effect, our prayer will bring down blessings on our own souls; and if that mind were in us, which was in him, we could not but be grieved to think of the tremendous ruin that hangs over the heads of our impudent injurers. —He who hath exalted the once suffering Redeemer, will in due time appear for all his people: the roaring lion shall not destroy their souls, which they have intrusted to the hands of their Surety; they are one with him, and precious in his sight, and shall be rescued from every peril and destruction; that with him they may give thanks in the great congregation above. Let us then give ourselves unto prayer, and study to be quiet in the land, however injured or deceived. Thus our enemies shall never triumph in our destruction; and their rejoicing over our temporal calamities shall be short-lived, as was that of the Jewish rulers over the crucified Redeemer. But let us chiefly fear lest they should rejoice at beholding us betrayed into sin, and disgracing our profession. This would please them more than seeing us cast into a fiery furnace, and they would exclaim, “Aha, aha, our eye hath seen it, so would we have it!” Then indeed, they that hate us without cause, would wink with their eyes, encouraging each other’s blasphemies; and open wide their mouths to proclaim our infamy, to the reproach of our religion. This the Lord knoweth, and as his glory is concerned, let us call upon him, that he would not be far from us; but constantly uphold us, that Satan and his servants may not thus magnify themselves against us. In all things let us act conscientiously, and leave our cause with God. And whilst we expect to see the opposers of Christ clothed with shame and dishonour, let us pray that all who favour his righteous cause, may rejoice, and be continually praising God: and let us remember, that he hath pleasure in the prosperity of all his servants; that we may be speaking of his righteousness and praise all the day long.

NOTES.

PSALM XXXVI. V. 1. David was as much convinced by the conduct of wicked men, that they were not habitually possessed by the fear of God, as if it had been immediately spoken to his heart. If the terrors of God for a moment affrighted them, they soon cast them behind their backs, or they could not have gone on in their daring crimes. It is probable that Saul was especially meant as the wicked man who persecuted "David the servant of the LORD," with persevering enmity; yet frequently cloaked his malice with professions of friendship, and still kept up an outward regard to religion. The psalm seems to have been written soon after Saul began to show his hatred of David.

V. 2. The wicked man not only disguises his crimes or intentions from others; but through the excess of self-love he becomes his own flatterer, calls his vices by soft names, or mistakes them for virtues; and deems his conduct justifiable, perhaps meritorious, when in fact it is a hateful compound of impiety, injustice, and malevolence, and will very soon be proved to be so.—Thus Saul's self-flattery kept him from being aware of the malignity of his conduct, till he became odious in the open view of mankind.

V. 3, 4. Saul, in the beginning of his reign, behaved wisely, and performed good service to his people: but he soon began to act foolishly, and to disobey God, and at length he entirely ceased to use his understanding to do good. He became a treacherous and cruel persecutor of David: and while he perhaps ascribed his conduct in throwing his javelin at him, to a sudden paroxysm of disease, David was aware that he most deliberately, and in his retired hours, plotted his destruction; and had no aversion in his heart to any wickedness, however abominable, though he tried to cloak his malice by plausible professions.

V. 5—9. The Psalmist here contrasted the divine perfections and government with the conduct of wicked men, especially when in power. The mercy of God is immensely large; and having filled the earth with its effects, it fills the heavens also, by the admission of redeemed sinners to that blessed state. His faithfulness reaches far above the shifting clouds, and is liable to no mutability or failure. His justice is placed on an immoveable basis, and he never varies from it: yet his judgments or decrees are unfathomably deep, to be adored and not comprehended by us. The Creator's care sustains and preserves both man and beast; and his immeasurable loving-kindness, in its varied exercises, encourages even the guilty and polluted sons of Adam to trust in his mercy, and to confide in his protection. (Note, Ruth ii. 11, 12.) In this refuge, and in this service, believers find abundant consolation, and drink "pleasures as from a river" flowing from the Fountain of life and felicity: and in the knowledge and favour of God they see light and glory inexpressible. (Marg. Ref.)—The word rendered pleasures, (3.) is the plural of Eden. 'In heaven alone the thirst of an immortal soul after happiness can be satisfied. There the streams of Eden will flow again.' (Horne.)

V. 10, 11. David was conscious of integrity, and had been favoured with much experience of the Lord's faithful and merciful care : but his dangers and troubles were multiplied, and all who knew God and uprightly served him, were in a measure involved in his difficulties. He therefore prayed, that the favour shown to him and them, might be prolonged according to the faithful promises of God ; and that He would judge in righteousness between his persecuted servants and their unrighteous persecutors. Then, says he, "The foot of pride shall not come against me; "and the hand of the wicked shall not cast me down." "I shall be preserved from the scornful oppression, and 'iniquitous power, of every enemy.'

V. 12. 'Faith calleth things that are not, as though they were; it carries us forward to the end of time; it shows us the Lord sitting on the throne of judgment, the righteous caught up to meet him in the air; the world in flames under his feet, and the empire of sin fallen to rise no more.' (Horne.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

To be the servant of the Lord is the highest privilege and honour to which we can aspire ; and they who are advanced to eminent stations in society, should glory to fill them up, as serving God and his church in them.—All the wickedness of men springs from contempt and forgetfulness of God : their actions speak more plainly than their words ; and when they commit atrocious crimes without remorse, or habitually live in the practice of any sin, we may be sure that there is no fear of God before their eyes, but that they habitually despise his favour and defy his wrath. But proud and ignorant men deceive themselves, and verily think their conduct excusable, when it is indeed most hateful : let us then daily beg of God to preserve us from self-flattery, and to bring us acquainted with our own character, that we may judge and condemn ourselves, and not finally be condemned at his tribunal.—When such as have appeared to be religious, leave off to behave wisely and to do good, they will soon be drawn into grosser crimes ; and the deceitful and corrupt language of their lips will betray the desperate wickedness of their hearts.—If we willingly banish holy meditations in our solitary hours, Satan will soon occupy our minds with polluting and mischievous imaginations : and when we yield frequently to sudden temptations, we shall at length deliberately devise mischief upon our beds.—Whatever be a man's outward conduct, if he do not abhor evil, he is no true penitent : and if he do not set himself heartily to walk in the ways of godliness, he will soon return unto the more direct road to temporal and eternal destruction.—The servants of God must expect much trouble from apostates and wicked men : but they may comfort themselves by contemplating the perfections of their Almighty Friend. His merciful promises engage to every believer the enjoyment of heavenly happiness : his unfailing faithfulness guarantees the engagement : his immoveable justice harmonizes with his truth and love : and his most mysterious appointments are the result of his infinite wisdom and goodness. Whilst all his creatures share his bounty and protection ; his compassion and mercy, and the provisions of his redeeming love are so immense, that the chief of sinners may come to him and receive pardon and peace, and put their trust under the shadow of his wings. Thither the alarmed and penitent flee for safety, perhaps imagining that they are thus renouncing all enjoyment in this present world : but they soon find, if decided and diligent, true happiness in the favour and service of God ; the provisions of his house are rich and plenteous ; and the consolations of his Spirit, communicated through his ordinances, are an earnest of heavenly joys. This river of the water of life proceedeth from the throne of God and of the Lamb ; and they must be happy who have access to the Fountain of life. Indeed God is the Source of felicity : but fallen man has forsaken him and is miserable. In Christ, however, this Fountain is accessible ; wells of salvation are opened for us by the Gospel ; and sinners returning to God according to it, see and enjoy light and felicity, in their source and perfection.—May we then know, and love, and uprightly serve the Lord ! Then shall we be interested in the prayers of all his people, and learn to love and pray for them : and his loving-kindness will be continued to us through the intercession of our heavenly Advocate. Then shall no proud enemy on earth or from hell come against us to trample upon us, or to separate us from his love ; but we shall be established in felicity, when all the workers of iniquity are cast down to rise no more for ever.

NOTES.

PSALM XXXVII. V. 1, 2. It is probable that this psalm was written towards the close of David's life, as the result of his long experience and observation, for the instruction and encouragement of others, who might be called to pass through trying scenes, such as he had been conversant with. Every other verse, in the original, begins with a letter of the Hebrew alphabet, nearly in regular order: and this arrangement, which, with some variations, is frequently adopted, might be intended as a help to those who desired to commit to memory these sacred poems, for their comfort and benefit in silence and solitude. The Mosaic dispensation engaged peculiar temporal blessings to the nation of Israel, whilst they were obedient: yet individuals frequently prospered in wickedness, whilst the righteous were afflicted and persecuted. This seemed to imply an inconsistency betwixt the word and the providence of God, and formed a great trial to ancient believers. To this difficulty the Psalmist here gives a copious solution, with many excellent cautions and counsels, which at the same time are equally suited, by varying a few expressions, to the case of Christians in this evil world. (Notes, &c. Psalm lxxiii.)

V. 3. This verse may be rendered: "Trust in the LORD, and do good; dwell in the land; and feed thou verily." All the verbs are imperative. The union between entire dependence on God, and doing good, as the way to be comfortable and happy, is peculiarly to be noticed. The land of Canaan was considered as the sum of earthly, and the type of heavenly, felicity: to dwell, and be provided for, in the LORD's land, under his protection, near his ordinances, and among his people, was all that the genuine Israelite could desire. But the words may be considered as an exhortation to the people to dwell in the land, and not to remove on every difficulty among the surrounding Gentiles; with a promise that verily God would feed them there.

V. 4. To delight, not in earthly possessions, enjoyments, and distinctions, but in God, in knowing, loving, and worshipping him, and enjoying his love; and to delight in contemplation, devotion, and admiring praise, is to be spiritually-minded, like the inhabitants of heaven, and qualified for their felicity. He that seeks delight in worldly objects very seldom obtains the wishes of his heart: but all the spiritual desires and requests of those that delight in God will be granted, nay, far exceeded. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 5—8. 'When thou hast any difficult business in hand, or when thou knowest not what course to take for accomplishing thy honest designs, leave all to the LORD, and trust to him, in pious and upright causes, that he will direct and assist thee, and bring things to a good issue.' (Bp. Patrick.) The original is 'Roll thy way, &c.' The Septuagint renders it, "Reveal thy way," &c: which is very expressive of the relief that the believer, when burdened with trouble and anxiety, obtains by opening his case, and pouring out his soul before God in fervent prayers. This may especially be hoped for under unmerited calumnies, which for a while darken the reputation: as mists and clouds obscure the sun: but God will in due time clear up the character of the upright, and make it as bright as noon-day. Silent waiting on God, in patience and confidence, is therefore recommended; without giving way to that uneasiness and agitation, which are generally felt, when the ungodly for a while prosper, and run down the conscientious, or to eagerness in self-vindication; and especially a caution is given against anger and bitterness, and an imitation of the vile tempers and unjust measures of those that are the objects of indignation and of envy. (Note v. 9.)

V. 9. The earth. Or the land. He has all that the earth itself can supply, who has food and raiment, and things suited to his station, with peace, contentment, and a thankful heart.

V. 10, 11. 'The whole duration of the world itself is but "a little while," in the sight of him, whose hope is full of immortality. But the calamities and death of princes, the tragical fate of empires "swept with the 12 * The wicked * plotteth against the just, and ^b gnasheth upon him with his teeth.

13 The LORD ^c shall laugh at him: for he seeth that ^d his day is coming.

14 The wicked ^e have drawn out the sword, and have bent their bow, to cast down the poor and needy, and ^f to slay [†] such as be of upright conversation.

15 * Their sword shall enter into their own heart, and ^h their bows shall be broken.

17 For ^k the arms of the wicked shall be broken: but ^l the LORD upholdeth the righteous.

19 They shall not be ashamed ^p in the evil time: and ^q in the days of famine they shall be satisfied.

20 But ^r the wicked shall perish, and the enemies of the LORD shall be as the [†] fat of lambs: they shall consume; ^s into smoke shall they consume away.

21 The wicked ^t borroweth, and payeth not again: ^u but the righteous showeth mercy, and giveth.

22 For such as be ^x blessed of him shall inherit the earth; and they that be ^y cursed of him shall be ^z cut off.

23 * The steps of a good man are ^φ ordered by the LORD: and ^b he delighteth in his way.

“besom of destruction;” “the overthrow of cities, whose place is now no where to be found by the most curious and diligent inquirer; and the desolations of the chosen city of Jerusalem—are sufficient to draw forth the tear of commiseration, and to extinguish the kindling spark of envy, in every considerate mind. The meek bear their own adversities and the prosperity of their enemies, without envy, anger, or complaint. They, and they only, possess the earth, as they go towards the kingdom of heaven, by being humble and cheerful, and content with what their good God has allotted them. They have no turbulent repining thoughts that they deserve better; —but they possess such a quietness, as makes their very dreams pleasing.” (Horne, and Walton in Horne.) —The meek, here spoken of, are not those of naturally easy, quiet, and indolent tempers; but such as are rendered humble, teachable, submissive, and gentle by the special grace of God: and the abundant inward peace which he bestows, and which passes all understanding, fills their souls with vast delight.

V. 12—15. The holiness and happiness of the righteous, and the special favour which God shows them, excite the enmity and envy of the wicked. Thus Cain hated and envied Abel; thus Saul, from a similar spirit, plotted against David, and gnashed on him with his teeth; and thus the Jewish rulers persecuted the holy Jesus and his disciples. For a while they seem to prosper; but the Lord despises their impotent malice, and foresees the day, when they will suffer the just punishment of their crimes; and when all their policy and violence will only serve to enhance their own misery. This is the certain doom of all persecutors, in proportion to their deliberate enmity to the cause of God, and his image in his humble, afflicted, and upright servants.

V. 16, 17. The little, which is allotted to the righteous, comes from special covenanted love, in answer to their prayers, and in the use of lawful means; it is received with thankfulness, and used with temperance and charity; and being attended with a blessing, it subserves the salvation of their souls: and in all these, and many other respects, it is far more comfortable and profitable, than the ill-gotten or abused riches of ungodly men: for their prosperity and power will soon become useless as a broken arm; while God himself protects and supports the righteous. “The great question then is, whether he be with us, or against us; and the great misfortune is, that this question is so seldom asked.” (Horne.)

V. 18, 19. God knoweth what things his children need, what dangers and enemies await them, and what sorrows they endure: and, as he is omnipotent and all-sufficient, and it is “his good pleasure to give them the ‘kingdom,’ the eternal inheritance; he will never leave them to want any thing really good for them by the way, however distressing the times may be in which they live; or to be ashamed of their confidence in him.

V. 20. Fat of Lambs, &c. As the fat of the sacrifices was consumed on the altar by the fire, (which was a type of God’s righteous vengeance upon sinners,) till it vanished into smoke: so the wicked will be sacrifices to God’s justice, and be destroyed by the fire of his indignation.

V. 21, 22. The wicked, though for a while prosperous, would soon be reduced by the secret curse of God on his affairs, to borrow, and disabled from paying; as well as careless about it: but the righteous would be rendered able to gratify their inclination in acts of liberal mercy, through the divine blessing, and the promise which secured to them the inheritance of the land. This more especially referred to the Israelites in Canaan: yet the same blessing and curse, even in temporal things, are still often experienced and observed.

V. 23, 24. Our translators here insert the word good, and no doubt the believer is meant. God directs, counsels, and supports his steps: and delights in his holy conversation, and the fruits of his own Spirit, which are through Christ well-pleasing to him. A good man may fall through temptation, as David did, in a most deplorable manner: but he shall not be cast down to rise no more, as hypocrites are; because God himself upholds him by his mighty power. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 25, 26. There is not an absolute promise in Scripture that no righteous man shall ever want bread, or his seed become beggars. But the Psalmist had never, during a long course of observation, known an instance of the kind. It is indeed a very rare case in any age, but was peculiarly so under the Mosaic dispensation. Yet times of persecution seem excepted from general rules concerning temporal things, having so many particular promises relating to them: and we cannot tell how it may please our wise and righteous God for our good, to try our faith and patience, or to remove us out of this world; or how he may see good to dispose of our posterity. But in general the godly man will best secure himself and his children from want; and that genuine liberality to the poor, which men think will impoverish their families, is the best way of laying up a provision for them.

V. 27, 28. This general counsel for present and future happiness is here again inculcated, in a manner which shows, that none but the saints, the regenerate and believing who have obtained mercy, do thus depart from evil and do good: and the final perseverance of the saints is most expressly maintained, and grounded on the Lord's love of judgment and faithfulness to his promises. Some think this doctrine is to be found no where, except in St. Paul's epistles; and then they endeavour to explain away his language: but not one sentence in his writings is more explicit than this declaration of the inspired Psalmist.

V. 30, 31. "The righteous man, whose mouth speaketh wisdom, whose tongue talketh of judgment, and in whose heart is the law of his God, shall not slide

"in any of his steps." Thus some render these verses, which strongly mark the character of those saints, "which are preserved for ever." Wise and pious conversation, when it comes from the abundance of the heart, and is enforced by a holy example, is one grand means of communicating the savour of divine truth around, in families and neighbourhoods, and of transmitting it to posterity. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 32, 33. In general God will defend his servants against the designs of wicked men, when, under colour of law, they seek to murder them by a judicial process: and in those cases in which he, for wise reasons, allows persecutors to prosper; he will finally rescue the persecuted from their malice, and openly reverse their unrighteous decisions. The wicked one, "the accuser of the brethren," will in like manner be baffled and silenced. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 34. "The apostle, writing to the Hebrew converts, under affliction and persecution, thus expresseth the sentiment contained in this verse; 'Cast not away your confidence, which hath great recompense of reward: for ye have need of patience, that after ye have done the will of God, ye might receive the promise. For yet a little while, and he that shall come, will come and will not tarry.'" (Horne.)

V. 35, 36. Our translation gives, as the emblem of a wicked man's prosperity, an ever-green, flourishing and beautiful to look upon, but bearing no fruit, or only such as is poisonous. But most expositors suppose that a tree, growing in its native soil, and never transplanted, is meant: and in these circumstances, trees acquire their largest and most luxuriant growth. Thus Saul, Doeg, and Ahithophel, in David's time, had flourished; and thus they had vanished. The vision of Nebuchadnezzar, and Daniel's interpretation, forms a striking illustration of these verses. "I looked to see what was become of him, and whether he was not removed, (as a tree sometimes is,) to another place, but there was no such man to be found." (Bp. Patrick.)

V. 37, 38. He that patiently and accurately observes the dealings of God with his upright, consistent, and faithful servants, will find, that whatever trials and disquietudes they have during a great part of their lives, their closing scene is tranquil and comfortable; and that there are very few exceptions to this general rule. But a contrary and dreadful end, sooner or later, awaits all the ungodly.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

It is of vast importance to understand the present and future condition of the righteous and the wicked; that we may know what to choose and to expect. The workers of iniquity, who cast off the fear of God to follow their own corrupt inclinations: and who are fraudulent, covetous, sensual, and profane; who plot against the righteous, gnashing upon them with their teeth, and using their power and subtlety to oppress, ruin, and murder the poor; even such monsters of wickedness often prosper for a time, succeed in their projects, flourish in wealth, pomp, and mirth, and seem to enjoy happiness. But their flourishing resembles that of the grass, and they will soon be cut down and wither: shortly they will be no more found on earth, into heaven they cannot enter; hell alone remains for them, where they will for ever be sacrifices to the righteous vengeance of their offended God. Then their power of doing mischief will be at an end, and their injurious words will pierce their own souls with inexpressible anguish. As they are now under the wrath and curse of the Almighty, their plenty and prosperity only pamper them for their destruction; and the wealth which they leave behind them proves a snare to their posterity; whilst terrors of conscience, dread of death, and furious passions, mar their precarious enjoyments, and give them a sad foretaste of the wrath to come. Who that believes these things, can envy them, or fret themselves at beholding their success and magnificence: whilst, like the heathen sacrifices, they are led to the slaughter, adorned with gaudy ribbands, and accompanied with the viol, the song, and the dance? —But the righteous bear another character, meet with other treatment, have other supports, and will experience a contrary end. They trust in the Lord, walk in his ordinances and commandments, and imitate Him who went about doing good to the bodies and souls of men. They delight in the favour and service of God, and expect their happiness from him: the leading desires of their hearts are after communion with and conformity to him, and to be instrumental to his glory: they follow after meekness, humility, and a blameless conversation: they are upright and sincere; and though often poor and needy, they spare from other expenses a portion to lend and give, as occasion requires. Their mouth will be speaking of wisdom, and their tongue will be talking of judgment: and this springs from the abundance of the heart, in which the law of God is written, and comports with the actions of their lives, which are ordered in his ways. Their salvation is from the Lord, and reigns within; and it appears that they are accepted through the merits, because they are partakers of the Spirit of Christ, and bring forth the fruits of the Spirit. Yet must such Christians expect tribulation in the world. They are not exempted from the common afflictions of life, or pampered with worldly prosperity: their heavenly Father does not withhold from them salutary correction; the world hates and despises them; calumnies, reproaches, and persecutions, are their usual portion: whilst some have been constrained to wander in dens and caves, others, (“of whom the world was not worthy,”) have been immured in prisons and tortured to death. In general they are a poor and afflicted people, and Satan distresses, as much as he can, those whom he is not able to deceive, defile, or destroy; their endeavours to do good are often unsuccessful, and ingratitude proves their only recompense. They therefore have need of faith and patience, of hope and love: but observing the directions, and pleading the promises of God, they find inward comfort to counterbalance their outward trials. He will maintain their lot, and supply their wants: whatever they lose for conscience sake, “verily they shall be fed;” and food and raiment here, with heaven at last, is a goodly portion. The Lord will also vindicate their characters, and give them peace of conscience; when he sees good, their enemies shall be at peace with them, and they shall enjoy more content, than if they actually inherited the earth, and shall delight themselves in the abundance of peace; for their little shall be better than the riches of many wicked. The Lord himself will uphold and protect them; he knows their days, and will proportion their strength and comfort, and in no evil time shall they be ashamed of their confidence, for they are the blessed of the Lord, and their children with them. He ordereth their steps and delighteth in their way; if they fall under temptation, they shall not be utterly cast down; if into trouble, he will not leave them to sink under it. Their work of faith, and labour and liberality of love, instead of impoverishing them, shall lay up an inheritance for their children: and few accurate observers of mankind have known the consistent believer or his children reduced to abject friendless penury. In short, the Lord having separated his people from the world, and taught them to love righteousness and judgment, will preserve them for ever; and, however they may be slandered, tempted, or persecuted by the way, their end shall be serene and happy: they shall have hope in their death, and be better spoken of afterwards, than during their lives; and whilst they enjoy their everlasting inheritance, they will witness the destruction of all

PSALM XXXVIII.

The Psalmist deprecates the wrath of God, and describes the sufferings to which his sins had exposed him, 1—10. He complains that his friends deserted him, while persecuted by his foes, 11, 12. He resigns himself to God, and hopes in him; while he confesses his sins, shows the character of his enemies, and pleads for deliverance, 13—22.

A Psalm of David, ^a to bring to remembrance.

O LORD, ^b rebuke me not in thy wrath; neither chasten me in thy ^c hot displeasure.

2 For ^d thine arrows stick fast in me, and ^e thy hand presseth me sore.

3 There is ^f no soundness in my flesh, because of thine anger; ^g neither is there any ^h rest in my bones, ⁱ because of my sin.

4 For ^j mine iniquities are gone over mine head: ^k as an heavy burden they are too heavy for me.

5 ^l My wounds stink, and are corrupt because of my foolishness.

6 I am ^m troubled; ⁿ I am bowed down greatly; ^o I go mourning all the day long.

7 For ^p my loins are filled with a loathsome disease: and there is no soundness in my flesh.

8 I am feeble and sore broken: ^q I have roared by reason of the disquietness of my heart.

impenitent transgressors. Even in this world it is evident that the afflicted righteous man is far happier than the most prosperous of the wicked. Let sinners then be counselled to depart from evil, and to do good; to repent and forsake sin, to trust in the mercy of God through Jesus Christ: and take his yoke upon them, and learn of him, that they may dwell for evermore in heaven. Let us all watch against impatience, envy, and despondency, and look more to the wretched end, than to the present state of wicked men; committing all we are, and have, and do, to the Lord's disposal, and He will order that which is best for us. Let us cease from wrath and contention, which are sure inlets to evil doing: and wait for and on the Lord, and keep his way, without wearying or turning aside: let us endeavour to give energy to edifying conversation by holy living: let us mark the closing scenes of different characters, and thus keeping our eyes fixed on eternal things, and our dependence on God's mercy, we may pass safely and comfortably through this dangerous and miserable life; meet death with composure, and have "an entrance ministered to us abundantly into the everlasting kingdom of our Lord and Saviour, Jesus Christ."

NOTES.

PSALM XXXVIII. Title. Either the Psalmist, under his affliction, composed this psalm to assist him in recollecting his sins, or in calling upon God to remember his distress; or he desired to remember as long as he lived, and wished to remind others, how he had suffered for his sins, and what his sentiments and sensations had been whilst enduring correction. It is the third of those that are called penitential psalms; and describes among his other trials some grievous diseases, with which he was visited for his sins; or, as some think, his inward trials were represented by language taken from enfeebling and loathsome sickness. It is probable, that the calamities which befel David, after his sin in respect of Bathsheba and Uriah, gave occasion to the doleful complaints contained in it. (Notes, &c. Psalm vi. xxxii.)

V. 2. Arrows. Acute pains, anguish of spirit, and sharp sufferings of any kind, are spoken of under the figure of barbed arrows, which fasten and rankle in the flesh, and cannot be extracted without the most exquisite torture.

V. 3. Soundness. Some understand this clause to mean, that disease had so altered the Psalmist, as scarcely to have left him the form or appearance of a human being. Whatever allusion may, in this passage, be made, either to the depravity of human nature, the prevalence of sin, or the anguish of the soul under a sense of divine wrath; it seems evident, that the writer was visited with some dire malady, which affected his whole frame in the most distressing manner, and that he considered this as the chastisement of God for some special sins of which his conscience accused him.

V. 4. David's iniquities, like the numberless drops which form a deluge, had been so multiplied, that they overwhelmed him; as waters which rise above a man's head, so that he can no longer stand against or escape them. And as he felt that the temporal consequences of his crimes were so distressing, and oppressed him beyond endurance; so, he seems to have been convinced, that the burden or guilt of them was far too heavy for him to endure, without finally sinking under it. What then was that load of guilt and punishment which Christ sustained, when "the LORD caused to meet on him the iniquities of us all;" and when "He bare our sins, in his own body on the tree!"

V. 5. Some accommodate this verse to the case of those who, having been wounded in their conflict with sin and Satan, foolishly delay submission, repentance, and application to the atoning blood of Christ, through pride and unbelief; while their souls in the mean time are growing more and more diseased and wretched, and their case more and more deplorable and disgraceful.

‘sighs they cost me, are not unknown to thee. Thou ‘knowest the agitation of my spirit, which wanders up ‘and down in restless thought, but all to no purpose; for ‘my strength has forsaken me: the light of my eyes
‘is so weak, that I can scarce make any use of them.’
(Bp. Patrick.)

V. 11, 12. Cowardice, pride, and selfishness, caused David’s friends and acquaintance to keep at a distance, during his afflictions; lest they should share his disgrace and danger, or be put to expense or inconvenience: but his enemies were emboldened in forming plans to accomplish his destruction. These particulars were still more emphatically verified, in the sufferings of the Son of David.
(Marg. Ref.)

V. 13, 14. David, in the patience and meekness with which he endured his complicated sufferings, was a type of Him “who, when he was reviled, reviled not again:”
but David’s troubles were the chastisement, and part of them seem to have been the consequence, of his transgressions; whereas Christ suffered for our sins, and our’s alone.

V. 15. The translation of one clause in this verse, in the common Prayer-book, contains an important instruction, “Thou shalt answer for me, O LORD, my God.”
Thus Christ was silent before his false accusers and unjust judges, and committed himself to “Him that judgeth “righteously.”

V. 16—18. It was evident that the enemies of David were ungodly men, who would rejoice in his falls and calamities from dislike, not to his sins, but to his religion:
and therefore the honour of God was concerned to confound and silence them; and consequently to uphold his servant, notwithstanding that he was conscious of his weakness and unworthiness. This consciousness, and the fear of the consequences, not only to himself, but especially to the cause of true religion, presented a most gloomy prospect before his eyes; except as he trusted in God to keep him from falling, for the honour of his own name; and as he inge-nuously confessed his past sins, and was grieved and distressed on account of them.

V. 19, 20. The humble spirit of a penitent pleading guilty before God; and the consciousness, at the same time, of being wrongfully hated and ungratefully and basely used by men; not for the sins he had fallen into in particular instances, but for the general tenour of a holy and useful life, are strongly marked in this passage; which shows, that the most decided rejoicing in the testimony of a man’s conscience, respecting his conduct towards men, in those things of which he has been unjustly condemned, is perfectly consistent with the deepest humiliation as a sinner in the sight of God.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

Under the temporal effects of the Lord’s abhorrence of sin, and the anguish of his correcting rod, the believer is most troubled with the apprehension of his vindictive wrath, and lest he should share the doom of the ungodly; and he can bear any thing when assured that this shall never be his case. Yet God often sees good, in order to warn others, to silence the reproaches of scoffers, to vindicate the honour of religion, and for other purposes of his glory, to make the afflictions of his offending children very sharp, complicated, and permanent; and to extort from them many doleful groans and lamentations. In such circumstances, when the correction begins to produce its salutary effects;
they readily trace their sorrows to the fatherly displeasure of the Lord, “whose arrows stick fast in them, and whose “hand presseth them sore; and they humbly acknowledge “their sins to be the cause of his anger.” Their own in-iquities form that deluge which goeth over their heads; and their sense of guilt is the heaviest burden that is laid upon them: "it is indeed too heavy for them to bear;" and would sink them into despair and ruin, unless removed by the pardoning mercy of God. The prevalence of sin, and the successful force of temptations from their worst diseases and most offensive and dangerous wounds: and whilst "there is no soundness in their flesh," and no rest in their bones, they are led to consider their souls, in which "there is no health." For pride, covetousness, envy, malice, and lust, are diseases of the soul of far greater malignity than fevers, dropsies, palsies, gout, or stone, are of the body: yet numbers feel not their sickness till it be too late to apply the remedy. But, when we perceive our true condition, the good Physician is valued, resorted to, and obeyed; though even they, who are in this sure way of an effectual cure, often retard it, and experience grievous relapses, through their foolishness: and their wounds rankle and corrupt, because they delay to go to their merciful Friend, and to apply the healing balm which he hath prepared. Would we not prolong our own miseries, when we are conscious of having offended, we should immediately approach the mercy-seat with penitent confessions and believing prayers; that without delay our sins might be pardoned, our strength renewed, and our enemy prevented from rejoicing over us. Yet the feeling and effects of the divine displeasure, must needs trouble him who loves God, and "bow him down greatly, and cause him to go mourning "all the day long;" and even enfeeble him, and cause him to "roar for the very disquietness of his heart:" for "a wounded spirit who can bear?" and this uneasiness will be in proportion to the degree in which we value the favour of God, and delight in communion with him. But while the hypocrite takes encouragement from David's sins to transgress; he is a perfect stranger to David's ingenuous anguish of spirit under the consciousness of his guilt. In the true believer's case, however, all this trouble will be useful: he will wait for and on his God, and not seek relief from the world or from himself: he will bring his whole desire before his heavenly Father, and be encouraged, because "his groaning is not hid from him;" even though like one expiring, "his heart panteth, his strength faileth, and the sight of his eyes is gone from him," and he knows not what to say or do. Nay, should all this be attended with the unkindness and inconstancy of lovers, friends, and relatives, who stand aloof from his affliction; whilst treacherous and cruel foes are laying snares for his life and seeking his hurt, and "speaking mischievous things, and imagining deceits all "the day long;" that consciousness of guilt, which forms his heaviest load, will keep down indignation, silence murmurs and reproaches, and produce meek and quiet submission. For if the holy Jesus bore all this without a complaint or a reproof, what reason can a humble sinner think he has to yield to impatience or anger, when mercifully corrected for his sins, whatever rod the Lord be pleased to employ? He will therefore be as one deaf and dumb, respecting the calumnies and scoffs of the wicked, when he feels himself to be under the divine rebuke for his sins; "he will commit himself unto him "that judgeth righteously;" and be thankful that he may yet hope and pray to him with the prospect of being heard and helped. When the wicked are ready to rejoice at our calamities, or to magnify themselves against us; when our feet slip, when we feel ourselves feeble, and ready to halt or stumble, and are grieved continually, that we have given, or lest we should give, them cause to triumph over us; we have good arguments to urge in prayer, why the Lord should help and uphold us. Let us then declare before him our iniquity, and be sorry for our sins; and seek earnestly the destruction of our inward foes, which are so lively and so strong. And if, notwithstanding our offences against God, our enemies hate us, not for our sins, but because we follow the thing that is good; let us not be discouraged by their wrongful and ungrateful enmity; seeing we are in this conformed to the Saviour: but after his example let us still persevere in endeavouring to overcome evil with good. Let us also continue in prayer that the Lord may pardon and subdue our iniquities: then will he never forsake us, or be far from us: for he will surely hasten to the help of all those who trust in him as their Salvation.

NOTES.

PSALM XXXIX. V. 1—4. It is thought that David wrote this psalm during Absalom's rebellion: and it is evident that the writer's mind was greatly discomposed, by injuries and temptations, when he began his meditation. He, however, resolved to practise the rules he gave to others (xxxvii.) and not only to walk with peculiar circumspection, but especially to watch over his words, and keep his mouth, as the mouths of animals are confined by a muzzle: for so the word signifies. Aware of the baseness of his enemies, he determined on a total silence before them: he would neither speak any thing in his own vindication, or to complain of them, nor utter any pious discourse, which would have been like throwing pearls before swine. Yet the treatment he met with, his indignation at the crimes which he witnessed, his zeal for the honour of God, and the restraint imposed on him, excited in his mind a vehement and painful commotion: and the thoughts that wrought within, proved like the blowing of embers, which produces an intense heat, and bursts forth into a flame. He did not indeed break his resolution by speaking before the wicked: but with vehemency and some tincture of impatience, he prayed to the Lord, that he might know his end, and how long he was to live, and to suffer such complicated evils: or, that being suitably affected with the shortness of life, and his own frailty, he might be the more engaged to prepare for death and eternity, and less concerned about all his temporal interests. — David in his entire silence, was a type of Christ when he answered nothing before Caiaphas, Herod, and Pilate.

V. 5. At his best state, Selah; Or, “when settled or “established most firmly.” Some things decay after a certain time, but generally last that time; others endure long, barring accidents, yet are easily broken: but the life of man not only wears out speedily as a garment, but is also brittle like glass.

V. 6. A vain show, Or, shadow, unsubstantial, and vanishing. Such are all the interests, pursuits, and distinctions of this world; about which men are constantly disquieting themselves and others, till death stops their career, and they leave their acquisitions without knowing who will at length possess them, and remove to a state of important and eternal realities.

V. 7, 8. Meditation on the vanity of all outward things, led the Psalmist to fix more entirely his expectation on God alone, as the Fountain of happiness: but recollecting his transgressions and proneness to sin, he earnestly prayed for deliverance from guilt and depravity; and that he might not, by subsequent misconduct, disgrace the cause of God and expose himself to the reproach of any foolish and wicked man: (the original is Nabal.)

V. 9, 10. While the consideration that his afflictions were appointed by his heavenly Father, silenced the Psalmist's complaints; yet he pleaded for a mitigation of them, because he was ready to sink under them. Thus Christ, when entering on the last scene of his unknown sufferings, prayed, “Father, if it be possible, let this cup pass from “me; nevertheless, not my will but thine be done.”

V. 11. ‘The word’ (rendered beauty,) ‘signifieth all ‘that man desireth, as health, force, strength, beauty, and ‘in whatsoever he hath delight: so that the rod of God ‘taketh away all that is desired in this world.’

A moth, &c. ‘The body is as a garment to the soul, in ‘which sin hath lodged a moth, which by degrees fretteth ‘away, first the beauty, then the strength, and finally the ‘contexture of the parts.’ (Horne.) Thus the greatest, as well as the meanest of men, is but mere vanity.

V. 12. The patriarchs lived in Canaan as in a foreign country, by the allowance of the possessors, moving their tents from place to place; and they confessed themselves to be strangers and pilgrims in the land: but David ruled as a powerful monarch and a renowned conqueror over the people of Israel, now fully settled in their promised inheritance. When, however, he considered the shortness and vanity of life, and looked forward to a future and permanent state; he too owned that he was a stranger and pilgrim on earth, even as they also had been. (Note, Gen. xlvii. 9.)

V. 13. Strength, &c. If this psalm was composed during Absalom's usurpation, David might mean, that he was desirous before he left the world, to recover his peace of mind, to be reinstated in his authority, and to retrieve his character. He, however, prayed that his faith, hope, and love might recover strength; that he might be enabled to do some further service to his people, before his death; and have inward comfort, when about to depart hence and be no more seen. His prayer in all these respects was completely answered. (Notes, &c. 1 Chron. xxix.)

PSALM XL.

David praises God for deliverance out of deep distress, and shows the benefit which would thence be derived to numbers, and the happiness of such as trust in God, 1—5. As a type of Christ he states the inefficacy of legal sacrifices, and the efficacy of the Redeemer's obedience, 6—8. He declares that he had published God's righteousness and salvation; and pleads for deliverance from urgent troubles, and for the confusion of his enemies, with the triumphing of the righteous, 9—17.

ticing or terrifying us into improper compliances, or by exciting our indignation and envy. When we are not able wholly to separate from them, we should double our watchfulness, and especially impose a strict restraint upon our tongues; lest we should be betrayed into boasting, reviling, slandering, flattering, or trifling conversation: remembering that they will criticise every expression, and turn it, if they can, to our disadvantage and the discredit of religion. Sometimes it may be necessary to keep silence even from good words, when they are likely to excite pro-ane contempt or rage: yet in general we run into an extreme, when we are backward to engage in edifying discourse. But if we be enabled to bridle our tongues, we shall often find ourselves incapable of repressing our passions. When zeal, anger, impatience, compassion, grief, and other conflicting affections are excited in the heart, confinement increases their force, and reflection excites more disquietude, till a fire seems to be kindled within, which must in some way break forth. In this case, it is our wisdom to retire, and pour out our hearts before God, and to utter our complaints, sorrows, and desires to him alone. It is also very composing to the believer's mind, under sore trials and temptations, to know and consider his end, and the measure of his days: but we are never suitably affected with such subjects except we pray over them, and are inwardly taught by the spirit of God. We need not inquire the precise time we have to live; it will answer every good purpose attentively to consider the shortness and uncertainty of life. Our days are but a hand breadth, or as nothing before God and in comparison of his eternity: and in our greatest prosperity, and in the vigour of youth and health, verily every man is altogether vanity. He cannot live long; he may die soon, and suddenly: his busy cares are useless, his acquisitions are a shadow; he is disquieted in vain: and if he succeed in heaping up riches, he must shortly leave them, not knowing who shall gather them. How absurd then are the perplexing anxieties and the incessant fatigues of the most successful worldling, who pursues such shadows to the marring of his present comforts, and the ruin of his immortal soul! Indeed the believer's disquietude about the difficulties of his path and the treatment he meets with, are not much more rational. We are happy in exact proportion; as we despair of happiness from this changing sinful world; and wait and hope for it from the mercy and all-sufficient love of God our Saviour. Instead of being much concerned about temporal things, let us earnestly pray to be delivered from all our transgressions; and that we may not be made a reproach to those who, being foolish at all times, never so much expose their folly, as when they deride the hopes or insult over the falls of the righteous. We should look above instruments, and view the hand of God in all our afflictions: and then faith in his wisdom, justice, truth, and love; and consciousness, that he only rebukes us for our iniquity, will render us silent and submissive, because he hath done it. Then our prayers for the removal of his stroke, even when we are consumed with the blow of his hand, will be offered with resignation to his will, and hope in his mercy. But if his fatherly chastisement of his children for their offences consume their strength and comeliness, as a moth fretteth away a garment: what will be the effect of his avenging wrath against his enemies! And as every man is vanity, it behooves sinners to make haste to seek forgiveness, before they go hence and be no more seen. The Christian's sorrows are all sanctified; the gracious Lord will wipe away his tears, and answer all his prayers: he cannot but feel his afflictions; yet as a stranger and a pilgrim on earth, he hopes for a better and more enduring habitation in heaven, where his heart and his treasure are already. He expects weariness and ill treatment by the way: but his stay here will not be long; and walking with God by faith, he goes forward on his journey, undiverted from his course, and not much cast down, by the ill accommodations or difficulties with which he meets. He only desires to be spared till his measure of service on earth be finished, and his title to heaven clear; and that he may depart in that vigorous exercise of faith and grace, which may be honourable to God, encouraging to his brethren, and comfortable to himself. Then going hence, and being no more on earth, he enters upon his perfect and eternal rest: and leaves his pious friends consoled with the joyful hope of a blessed re-union; and instructed by his words and actions, how to live, to suffer, and to die.

NOTES.

PSALM XL. V. 1—5. In this psalm David seems to have intended to speak of his own case and experience ; but the Holy Spirit led him to use language, which in its full meaning can be applied to none but the Lord Jesus himself. The whole indeed may be accommodated to him, yet some passages seem more suited to the case of the Type, than to that of the Antitype. These verses may be interpreted of the Redeemer's deep and dreadful sufferings, and the happy effects which followed his deliverance from them. Exposed to the cruelty and malice of men, the horrid assaults of Satan, and the wrath of the Father, when bearing our sins ; he was as one sinking in a dark and noisome pit, where dreadful noises are heard, and he was ready to be covered and suffocated with the miry clay : but under all these sufferings, he " waited " patiently for the Lord ;" and his earnest prayers were heard : at his resurrection he was brought forth from the grave and the state of the dead : and in his exaltation he was placed as on an immovable rock ; his goings were established, his remaining work became easy, and his full success was ensured. Thus a new song was put into his mouth, which he teaches his people : for no such redemption could before be celebrated ; and multitudes, by faith, beholding his sufferings and the glory which followed, have learned to fear the justice, and trust in the mercy of God, through him. Such persons are made happy ; whilst they do not regard the rich and great so as to trust in them, or proud tyrants and persecutors so as to dread their rage ; and while they renounce all connexion with those who turn aside to idolatrous and superstitious delusions, or the deceitful interests and pleasures of sin. Many wonderful works the Lord had done for sinful man and for Israel ; but this would exceed them all : nor could the number or value of his thoughts and contrivances of love and mercy be ever numbered or estimated. Yet the passage may also be explained of David, and answers to some parts of the believer's experience. David had been in many troubles, and seemed ready to sink in them, as in a horrible pit ; but faith, patience, and prayer, supported him, and carried him through all : in due time he was rescued, advanced, and established ; his way was made plain and prosperous ; a new song was put into his mouth, his example became useful to many, and his life was spent in attempting to reckon up and celebrate the wonders and counsels of the love of God to him and to his people, yet he could not at all do justice to the delightful subject. The third and fourth verses may be connected as follows. ' Many shall see it, and fear, and shall trust in the LORD : Saying, blessed is the man,' &c. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 6—8. It is uncertain whether David had in these verses any intention of declaring, that cheerful and prompt obedience to the precepts of the moral law, proceeding from faith and love, was more acceptable to God than any legal sacrifices : but it is evident that the Holy Spirit foretold the obedience of the promised Messiah. Sacrifices, though appointed of God, were of no intrinsic value : he neither delighted in them, nor required them for their own sake : nor could they take away sin. But the incarnation and obedience of the Son of God, which they shadowed forth, were previously appointed for that purpose. His ears were opened to receive and obey the command of the Father ; or pierced as those of servants were, who choose to continue perpetually with their masters. When the legal sacrifices were declared inefficient, the Redeemer promptly answered, " Lo, I come," &c. According to the eternal purpose of JEHOVAH, and as it was written in the Scriptures from the beginning, or the opening of the roll, concerning him, he was prepared to appear in human nature to magnify the law of God by his perfect and divine obedience, even unto the death of the cross : yea, his cordial love to the holy commandment, and his zeal for the honour of the divine government and perfections, and his compassion for the souls of men, were so powerful, that he delighted in thus performing the will of his heavenly Father. (Note, Heb. x. 5—10.) In quoting this passage, the apostle follows the translation of the Septuagint, which gives an interpretation, rather than a translation, of the words rendered, " Mine ears hast thou opened." But as this variation did not at all affect his argument or alter the meaning of the passage, it was not necessary that he should interrupt his subject by noticing it.

V. 9, 10. While David avowed the earnestness and boldness with which he had celebrated the works and ways of God, he typified Christ in the performance of his prophetic office. Neither reproach nor persecution had caused David to refrain his lips from declaring before the congregation of Israel, the righteousness, faithfulness, loving-kindness, and salvation of the Lord. He had not been contented with treasuring these subjects up in his heart, for his private use ; but had openly published them for the edification of the people and the honour of God. Thus Christ, personally before his sufferings, and by his ministers afterwards, published to innumerable multitudes the justice, truth, and mercy of God; his method of justifying and sanctifying sinners, as well as the ways of righteousness in which he guides them. The connexion of the term thy righteousness, with loving-kindness, mercy, faithfulness, and salvation, and the subject evidently intended, warrants this interpretation; and shows that "the righteousness of God, which is unto all, and upon all that believe," was primarily meant. The word rendered preached, is seldom used: but it seems precisely to signify preaching the Gospel, proclaiming the glad tidings of salvation.

V. 11, 12. David might be here pleading for an interest in those mercies and that salvation which he proclaimed to others; when he was struggling with those complicated evils, which were consequent to his iniquities in the matter of Uriah. These called all his other sins to his remembrance, which took such hold on him, and so discouraged him, that he should not have dared to look up, if it had not been for his belief of the infinite mercies of God. Or, as some think, Christ may be supposed to speak, in the depth of his humiliation, when our innumerable iniquities met upon him, in his agony in the garden, and his sufferings on the cross.

V. 14, 15. These verses are throughout in the future tense, and naturally express the language of lively faith and hope, rather than that of wishing or desiring the destruction foreseen and predicted. An undue regard to the Septuagint and other ancient versions, seems to have induced our venerable translators generally to put such passages in the imperative, which, at first view, at least gives them an appearance of harshness, not so congenial to the spirit of devotion. The two former verses, however, viewed as predictions of the destruction which awaits the obstinate enemies of Christ and his church, have been wonderfully accomplished in the dire end of many traitors and persecutors, and in the condition of the Jews to this day.

V. 16. "All those that seek thee shall be glad and rejoice in thee; such as love thy salvation, shall say continually, The LORD be magnified." "I am confident, that this eventually will be the case; notwithstanding

'present temptations and sufferings.' The clause, "love thy salvation," exactly discriminates a true believer from all other men. (Marg. Ref.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

We are here again called upon to contemplate the intense sufferings into which our sins plunged the divine Saviour, when he willingly gave himself for us a sacrifice unto God: and we should also mark his patient confidence in the Father under them all; and observe how his prayers were heard, his soul delivered, and his body raised; and how, in human nature, he was exalted to be a Prince and a Saviour. In his exaltation all his people should rejoice: the new song which was put into his mouth, was intended for our use, that we might render praises unto our God: and the whole interesting scene, and all the mediatorial power and grace of our exalted Saviour, were designed to warn sinners to flee from the wrath to come, and to put their trust in the mercy of the Lord. Happy are all they who renounce every lying vanity and carnal confidence, thus to depend upon the living God: they shall continually experience the faithfulness of his promises, and contemplate with admiring gratitude all the counsels of his love, and his wonderful works in behalf of his redeemed people: nor will they be able to eternity to exhaust the subject, or recount all the particular instances of his mercy to them. Yet the incarnation and suretyship, the obedience and sufferings of the Son of God, are the centre and the means of all other mercies to us. Thus is God glorified, and sinners are saved: no costly sacrifices or even moral righteousness can be acceptable from sinners to a holy God, except as they stand in relation to the person and atonement of his beloved Son. In his obedience unto death the eternal purposes were accomplished, the types and prophecies of the old dispensation were fulfilled; the law of God was magnified, and the demands of justice were satisfied. Humiliating and painful as this obedience was, Jesus delighted to perform it: the law of God possessed his heart, and he was bent upon honouring its precepts and its awful sanction; that all might learn the excellency of the command, and the evil of transgression, in connexion with the infinite love of God to sinners. Now his redemption is completed, and the proclamation is sent forth to call upon us to come and accept of it. May we believe his testimony, trust his promise, and submit to his authority! For all who thus seek the Lord shall rejoice in him; and all that love his salvation will say continually, The Lord be magnified: whilst the shame and ruin of impenitent sinners, especially of those who oppose his cause, or seek to destroy his people, and rejoice in their calamities, are ensured by the predictions and denunciations of the word of God, and even by his intercessions for his church. But if the holy Jesus, "the beloved Son, in whom the Father was well pleased," endured such innumerable evils, and became so poor and needy for our sakes; shall we, whose iniquities are more in number than the hairs of our head, complain when we meet with pain and poverty! Had it not been for his voluntary and vicarious sufferings, our sins would have taken such hold on us, that we should never have been able to look up: our hearts must indeed have failed, and in the horrible pit, whence there is no escape, our hopes would for ever have expired. Of this believers are fully convinced: and this should teach them patient submission under every trial. And if any are struggling with remorse of conscience and fears of wrath, and, to their own apprehension, sinking in a deep and horrible pit: let them wait patiently for God and cry humbly unto him; and he will hear and help them, and turn their fears and sorrows into joyful praises. If we are thus rescued, let us continue to pray that our goings may be established in holiness, as a proof that we are fixed upon the Rock of salvation. And that our praises may be honourable to God and profitable to men, we should endeavour to unite humble dependence on Christ with obedient imitation of him. For those that are really his, are taught in a measure to delight in doing his will, and have his law written in their hearts. Let us not then be ashamed of him or of his word; but declare his righteousness, truth, and salvation, according to our place in the church, to all around us. Let us put our whole trust in his mercy under every trial, and seek to him to make haste to help and deliver us, and to disappoint Satan and every foe, that seeketh after our souls to destroy them. Though despised and obscure, let it suffice us, that the Lord thinketh of us: and if he be our Help and Deliverer, he will make no long tarrying; but will soon remove us out of the reach of sin and sorrow, and even raise our bodies from the grave, that we may be with him, and behold and share his glory for ever.

NOTES.

PSALM XLI. V. 1—3. It is generally agreed, that David wrote this psalm during Absalom's rebellion, when it seems, his other afflictions were accompanied with sickness; or rather he had previously been visited with some dangerous disorder, from which his enemies hoped he would not recover, and this emboldened them in their treasonable practices. Finding his affliction aggravated by their cruelty and perfidy; he was led to commend that temper of mind, which disposed a man to consider and compassionate the afflicted; and to declare him happy who possessed it. Some render the first clause, "Blessed is he that judgeth wisely of the poor:" "not condemning him as accursed whom God doth visit, (as Job's friends did him;) knowing that there are divers causes why God layeth his hand upon us, yea, and afterwards he restoreth us." It is, however, generally understood to refer to the considerate, active, and liberal kindness shown to the poor and afflicted, from genuine faith and love. (Marg. Ref.) Such a becoming conduct would ensure a man a gracious recompense from God; either exemption from the calamities, which in evil times befel others, the preservation of his life, with many blessings, and protection from envious and spiteful enemies; or, in case of sickness, with inward strength and various alleviations, (as when the bed of the sick is turned and smoothed to aid their repose;) till health was restored, or till a peaceful death terminated all his sorrows.

V. 4—8. David was conscious that his affliction was a correction for his sins; and with humble confessions pleaded especially for the healing of his soul: but his enemies reviled him, and impatiently expected his death, and hoped that his very name and memory would be disgraced. Recollecting their former behaviour, and comparing it with their conduct in following Absalom, he perceived that their apparent kindness and their visits were only intended to amuse him with vain professions of attachment, and to gain an opportunity of collecting materials of slander and reproach. They maliciously adverted to every one of his words and every part of his behaviour, treasuring up in their mind whatever could be unfavourably interpreted, and then whispering it abroad among the people, to prejudice them against him and his government. And considering his malady as a proof of his guilt, (a thing of Belial,) they exulted in the hope that he would sink under it to rise no more.

V. 9. As David was a type of Christ, so was Abithophel in some respects of Judas. The latter clause of this verse was fulfilled in Judas' ungrateful and cruel treachery. But Christ never trusted in him, as David had in Abithophel; therefore the former part was more suited to the type than to the antitype. (Notes, 2 Sam. xvi. 20—23. John xiii. 18.) "The sufferings of the church, like those of her Redeemer, generally begin at home;—and unnatural as it may seem, they who have waxed fat upon her bounty, are sometimes the first to "lift up the heel against her." (Horne.)

V. 10. "Thou art able to restore me to my throne,—and then I shall punish them, according as my office and their wickedness requires." (Bp. Patrick.)

V. 11—13. The Psalmist, amidst his complicated trials, concluded with lively actings of faith and adoring praises. Had not God favoured or delighted in him, his enemy would certainly before that time have been triumphing over him. He was still upheld in an upright and conscientious adherence to the cause of God and religion: and in assured hope of future felicity; and therefore he praised the LORD God of Israel, calling on all the people, by repeating earnestly (Amen, or let it be even so,) to his zealous adorations, to make them their own.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The people of God are not exempted from poverty, sickness, or any external affliction: but He considers their case and wants, and vouchsafes them relief proportioned to the exigency: He delivers them from trouble, preserves their lives, and gives them blessings on earth, as long as is really good for them: He does not give them over unto the will of their enemies: and even upon the bed of languishing sickness, which is so depressing to nature, he communicates such strength and consolation, as render them calm and easy. After the Lord's example of kindness and compassion, the believer also has learned to consider his poor and afflicted brethren. In them he sees the once suffering Saviour; and gratitude to him unites with love to his people, in disposing him to alleviate their sorrows and supply their wants, according to opportunity and ability: nor does he exclude any other sufferers from his deep compassion, and such relief as he can afford them. Thus he evidences the reality of his faith, and obtains the assurance of gracious supports from God when afflictions fall to his share. But nothing is so distressing to the contrite believer, as a sense of the divine displeasure, and the prevalence of sin in his heart: pain and sickness will remind him to pray especially for pardoning mercy; and for the healing of his soul, which is wounded and diseased, because he hath sinned against the Lord. The most humble and upright may well expect to meet with enmity, contempt, treachery, and ingratitude from the wicked; when the holy Jesus was not only despised and rejected of men, but was betrayed and sold by one of his own apostles, whom he had treated with the utmost kindness, and distinguished by the most valuable external privileges.—Let us continually look unto Jesus, that we may not be stumbled or discouraged, if without cause many calumniate or injure us, and wish for or even seek to compass our death, or rejoice and insult over our misery or disgrace. Should any profess religion, and pretend friendship to us, and court our acquaintance, and insinuate themselves into our confidence and affection on purpose to slander and betray us, let us still remember that Christ met with far worse treatment in all these respects, than we can do; and if we in any measure walk in his steps, we must expect a proportionable share of enmity, contempt, and ingratitude. He, being risen from the dead and constituted Judge of all, will requite all his obstinate enemies: but in our private capacity we must not desire to avenge ourselves, but copy his example when he prayed for the forgiveness of his murderers. However we may be tempted and afflicted, it is a token for good, if Satan our enemy be not permitted to triumph over us: and if the Lord be merciful to us, and favour us, and uphold us in our integrity, "he will set us before his face for ever;" and then our enemies will finally be subdued, and all our sorrows terminated. In the anticipation of faith and hope, let us then on earth solace ourselves under our conflicts and sorrows, by beginning the work of heaven: and give our cordial assent to those praises which the redeemed are continually rendering to their God and Saviour: saying, "Blessed be the LORD God of Israel from everlasting, and to everlasting. Amen, and Amen."

PSALM XLII.

The Psalmist thirsts after God; mourns his absence from the sanctuary amidst insulting foes; and recollects with regret former seasons of comfort, 1—4. He struggles against unbelief and despondency, complains unto God, and stays his dejected soul on him, 5—11.

NOTES.

PSALM XLII. Title. ‘A psalm to give instruction, committed to the sons of Korah, who were of the number of the Levites, as a treasure to be kept by them.’ This psalm begins the second book, according to the division made by the Jews. It has not David’s name prefixed to it: yet there is little doubt but that he composed it, when driven from Jerusalem and beyond Jordan, by Absalom’s rebellion; and thus deprived of the benefit and comfort of public ordinances, under his complicated afflictions.

V. 1—3. The disconsolate state of the Psalmist’s mind is illustrated by one of the most expressive comparisons that can be imagined. The hart or deer, when covered with dust and sweat, having been long chased on a sultry day, is ready to faint and die, and pants or brays to quench his extreme thirst from the brooks of water. Thus David longed and mourned after the courts of God: but still more for the living God himself; for his presence and favour, and those pleasures that he had enjoyed in communion with him. The want of these consolations was the more grievous; because his former confidence was now openly derided, and it was thought, either that God had deserted him, and would not or could not, afford him any relief. And these taunts and reproaches so distressed him, that he lost his appetite for his food, and tears were as his meat continually, his only solace and relief, day and night.

V. 4, 5. In this distressing situation, the Psalmist recollected former times, till his soul was even poured out, or melted within him. He had been used to accompany the multitude to the house of God, upon their solemn feasts; and he counted it his chief honour and happiness to join in their sacred songs of joy and praise: but now he was driven as an exile far from that sacred scene; and

Jerusalem itself was profaned by the wickedness of his adversaries. Yet still he knew that he ought not to yield to despondency: he would therefore call his soul to account for being thus cast down and disquieted. Past experience and express repeated promises combined to encourage his hope, that God would yet favour, comfort, and help him, which would be done effectually with a look or a smile; for “his presence is salvation.” (Marg.)

V. 6—8. The Psalmist’s dejection continuing, notwithstanding his struggles against it, he next complains of it to his God: being resolved to remember him with faith and hope and prayer, though apparently turned to be his enemy; and though he was banished from mount Zion, into a remote part of the land beyond Jordan, to some little hill in the land of Hermon: for the word Mizar, is justly rendered in other places, small or little. (2 Chr. xxiv. 24. Is. lxiii. 18.) His sorrows were so complicated, and his outward calamities and inward anguish so combined; that he was like a ship in a violent storm, when assaulted by one billow after another, as if they called upon each other to concur in its destruction: while the water-spouts, rushing with impetuous force into the ocean, with a dreadful noise, call also upon it to unite in overwhelming the astonished mariners, who sink into the deep, where all the waves and billows go over them. Thus David seemed ready to be swallowed up by his enemies; who, along with his inward distresses, were as water-spouts, waves, and billows, with which God seemed ready to overwhelm him for his sins. Yet he trusted that he would command these storms into a calm: (Matt. viii. 26.) In due season he hoped that he would discover his loving-kindness to him, which would be as the return of the day to his soul; and therefore he would praise him for the past, and make his prayer unto him, as the God of his life, even in the darkest night of sorrow and trouble. Or, he resolved to make the mercies of every day the subject of his praise, and the encouragement of his hope and prayer during the night-season, when pain or uneasiness prevented his sleep.

V. 9, 10. Though the Psalmist was sensible that God was chastising him for his sins; yet he was conscious of being truly penitent. He knew also that his cause was that of God and righteousness, and that his enemies hated him for his religion. So that he could not but wonder, on what account God, his Rock, so long forgot his servant, and left his oppressors to prosper; while they put him to extreme torture, by their impious sarcasms and reproaches.

V. 11. 'This repetition doth declare, that David did not overcome at once; to teach us to be constant, for as much as God will certainly deliver his.'—The concluding words are rather varied—"The salvations of my countenance, and my God." The deliverances and consolations of God, his salvation, had often made the Psalmist to lift up his face with joy and gladness, and he trusted he should again praise him for similar mercies.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The believer, in proportion to the degree in which he is spiritually-minded, will either be rejoicing in, or mourning after, the living God. The thirsty hart not more eagerly panting for the refreshing stream, than the lively Christian desires the consolations of the Holy Spirit and the tokens of the love and presence of God: nothing else can afford him satisfaction; and temptations, afflictions, and discouraging delays increase the spiritual appetite, and make him the more to thirst for these living waters. He therefore values public ordinances, and delights in attending on them: so that it is indeed a great affliction to him to be banished or confined at a distance. Yet, unless he meet his God, and enjoy communion with him, he returns even from his courts disappointed and dissatisfied; and looks especially with longing expectation for that season, when he shall appear before him in the temple above, and be for ever satisfied in his favour, and that joy with which his manifested glory fills every enraptured beholder. But the comfort of his hope is often abated, and even turned into mourning, in this evil world, by the insults and the blasphemies of those who deride his confidence in God as presumption or delusion; especially when under divine rebukes, or bereft of external advantages. In such seasons of distress and prevailing iniquity, we recollect more pleasant and prosperous days, when we assembled with the people of God, and joined in his worship with the voice of joy and praise: and, comparing them with present trials, we are apt to indulge impatience and despondency. It behooves us, therefore, under every distress, to call ourselves to account; and to inquire why we are so cast down and disquieted? We may have great cause to mourn for sin, and to pray against prevailing impiety: but our extreme dejection, even under the severest afflictions or inward trials, springs from unbelief and a rebellious will: and we should therefore strive and pray against it, and endeavour to hope in God, persuaded that we shall yet praise him for the salvation of his countenance. Our enemies may indeed drive us from public ordinances, deprive us of our bibles, banish us into deserts, or immure us in prisons; but they cannot bereave us of God's favour, or preclude our approach to the throne of grace. Let us then complain of ourselves unto Him, and remember his mercy and power, under every disconsolation. And if one trouble follow hard after another: if divine rebukes from above, the assaults of hell from beneath, and the insults of men, like floods, waves, and water-spouts, seem to combine for our ruin; let us remember that they all are appointed and over-ruled by the Lord; and that we deserve more than all we endure on earth: let us recollect how Jesus said, "My soul is exceeding sorrowful even unto death;" and how he suffered both from the cruelty of man, the rage of Satan, and the justice of the Father; yet was he heard and delivered. In his name, let us hope and pray: one word from him will calm every storm, turn the midnight darkness into the light of noon, and the bitterest complaints into joyful praises. We should then employ our time under tedious and discouraging trials, in praising God for his mercies to his church and to us, and in prayer for deliverance. Ere long our night of sorrow will finally terminate, and eternal day will succeed. Let us then never think that the God of our life and the Rock of our salvation hath forgotten us; if we have made his mercy, truth, and power our refuge. Even though we cannot but go mourning, because of the oppression of the enemy; and though the reproaches of the ungodly are painful, as a sword in our bones: yet we should struggle against despondency; and still hope in and praise God: his favour will be the health and help of our souls, and he will be our Shield and exceeding great Reward.

PSALM XLIV.

The church acknowledges God's former mercies, and resolves to trust in him,

NOTES.

PSALM XLIII. V. 1. This is evidently a continuation of the preceding psalm, and was written before David had obtained deliverance. Every day brought him fresh intelligence concerning the ungodly, ungrateful, and unmerciful conduct of Israel in general; the bulk of the nation having joined the conspirators, and being ready to proceed to all lengths against the life of their aged king, which the deceit and iniquity of Absalom or Ahithophel could suggest against him. But these reports, instead of dismaying him, seem to have raised his hope: as they confirmed his confidence in the justice of his cause; and warranted his appeal to the Judge of the world, to decide between him and his most injurious foes.

V. 3. Light. 'Thy favour, which appeareth by the performance of thy promises.' Perhaps the Psalmist also meant, the light of heavenly wisdom, teaching him how to act in such trying circumstances, so as to wait in the path of duty, for the performance of God's promises, and especially till restored to the ordinances of the sanctuary, which were far nearer to his heart, than the re-establishment of his outward prosperity and confirmation of his authority. There were at this time two tabernacles: that erected by Moses was at Gibeon; and the ark of the covenant was stationed on Mount Zion, in a tent which David had prepared for it. (Notes, 1 Chr. xvi. 37—43.)

V. 4. My exceeding joy. Or, The gladness of my joy. The fervent language used by the Psalmist, while anticipating his sacrifices of thanksgiving at the altar, is widely different from the frigid unimpassioned religion of modern Christians, and shames the lukewarmness of most of us.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

Under the returns of distress and disconsolation, we should again and again have recourse to the effectual and only remedy of faith and prayer. As Israel treated David, after all his successes, and notwithstanding his wisdom and piety, with such ingratitude, treachery, and injustice; and as even his beloved Absalom and his professed friend and counsellor Ahithophel joined and headed the base conspiracy; and as the Son of God met with far baser treatment from the same favoured yet ungodly and merciless nation: so no eminence or usefulness can exempt any pious man from the contempt or injuries of the wicked; whether he have to do with collective bodies or individuals. But we should commit our cause to God, and he will plead, and deliver us from every unrighteous and treacherous assault. And though inward temptations often concur with outward afflictions; yet God will never cast off those who trust in him as their Protector and Strength. We should therefore discard such dishonourable fears; and pray the more earnestly that the Lord would send forth the truth of his word and the light of his Spirit, to guide us into the ways of holiness, peace, and salvation; and by means of his ordinances on earth, bring us to his holy habitation in heaven. Through Christ, our Altar and Sacrifice, we may here find joy in God, for which we should bless and praise his name: but under every suspension of comfort, and under every trouble, we should look forward to the season, when "God, our exceeding joy," will end our sorrows and complete our felicity. Let us then silence our complaints, and repeatedly inquire, "Why art thou cast down, O my soul? and why art thou disquieted within me?" And resolve still to hope in God; for we "shall yet praise him; who is the Health of our countenance and our God."

it fully suit any period in the history of the old testament-church: for even in the days of Hezekiah under Sennacherib's oppression, or under the persecution by Antiochus Epiphanes, the bulk of the nation could not have made the solemn protestation contained in it, (17—22;) and it would have been still more unsuitable to the case of the Jews, during the Babylonish captivity. It is therefore no very improbable conjecture, that David, or some other prophet, composed this psalm, for the use of the true church, in every age, when persecuted for conscience-sake. The remnant of suffering believers are here introduced, as recollecting the work of God for Israel in former ages, to encourage their hope of his further protection and powerful interposition. Joshua and the Israelites fought valiantly against the Canaanites: yet their victories were not owing to their own valour or strength, but to the power and favour of God. The apostles laboured in the most zealous and self-denying manner to spread the Gospel in the primitive times: but its prevalence was not the effect of their eloquence or wisdom, or assiduity; but of the Holy Ghost sent down from heaven to succeed their labours. The conversion and salvation of the believer is not effected by his merit, wisdom, or resolution; but springs from the mercy and grace of God; yet he diligently uses the appointed means.

V. 4. "Thou art He, my King, O God: command the salvations of Jacob." "Thou art the same Almighty God and Saviour, who by thy sovereign will didst of old effect these wonderful deliverances for thy people.—"Thou art our King, as thou wast their's: therefore save and deliver us, as thou didst them." This is a never failing plea for the church under persecution, and for the believer, when steadily resisting temptation.

V. 5—7. God is frequently spoken of as an Horn, or as raising up for his church "an Horn of salvation:" and the Psalmist, with allusion to that metaphor, says, "Through thee will we push down our enemies." For the cause of God must to the end be maintained by the same powerful aid, which from the first made it to prevail.

V. 8. Or, "We will praise thee continually, and will confess thy name for ever." Selah.—The whole confidence being placed in God, the whole glory will be rendered to him, and that for ever. The original does not convey the idea of boasting or glorying in God; though the idea is found in many parts of Scripture.

V. 9—16. Israel, in general accustomed to victory by the help of JEHOVAH, is here represented as worsted and crushed by the enemy. The Lord is pleased to permit his church sometimes to be run down, as if he had cast her off with abhorrence: his people are then plundered and oppressed: many are slain as sheep, for the pleasure or profit of their persecutors; or driven from their native country, and scattered amongst idolaters and savages; or sold at a vile price like the meanest of slaves. Of all these events, the history of the church gives many affecting illustrations. Thus the Lord seems to sell his people for nought, and allow his enemies to prevail, even to his own dishonour; as if he parted with his flock, without any increase to his other wealth. And whilst these things are transacting, his people have trials of cruel mockings, insults, and reproaches; which they could the better endure, did they not also continually hear the name and truths of God blasphemed, by their impious and revengeful enemies. From the twelfth to the fifteenth verse, (both inclusive,) is future in the original: and perhaps the Psalmist meant, that past calamities led the people to very doleful conclusions as to the event.

V. 17-22. 'Certainly we have deserved them all,' (these calamities,) 'though this comfort is still remaining, 'that we are not so wicked as to be moved by all this 'to desert thee, and violate that covenant, whereby we are 'engaged to worship thee alone.' (Bp. Patrick.) The formalist commonly escapes persecution by turning with the stream, and purchasing security by sinful compliances or open apostacy : but the true church of God cannot be prevailed on by menaces, sufferings, or promises, to forget God, or deal falsely in his covenant : and as the believer's heart doth not turn back from God, so his feet do not decline from his way. Neither the malice, subtlety, nor poison of the old serpent and of his progeny, even when permitted to torment him grievously, can induce him to turn aside to idolatry, or to renounce his God and Saviour. This hath been proved in ten thousand instances, whilst the disciples of Christ have been covered as with a shadow of death, in their constant expectation of it ; and they have seen their brethren killed, by every tedious excruciating method, "all the day long, and accounted as sheep for the "slaughter." Their regard to the authority of their holy heart-searching God, effectually preserves them even from secret wickedness ; and they make their appeal to him concerning their integrity. And indeed, so far from suffering for their iniquities, they are hated and killed for the Lord's sake ; because they bear his image, profess his truths, adhere to his commandments, and seek his glory. The place of dragons, or serpents, or monsters, gives the idea of a man cast into a situation in which every hateful and dreadful creature surrounded him. Such are persecutors, and such are evil spirits, who employ them.

V. 23-26. In this trying situation the church earnestly cries for help to God, by whose permission these afflictions come upon her, and who alone can remove them. They plead their great misery : through oppression and inward dejection they are thrown prostrate, and trampled in the dust, and even cleave to the ground as utterly unable to arise : and as he had sold them, so they pray him to redeem them by his power, and through the appointed ransom, that his mercies may be glorified in their help and deliverance. 'There is a time when the triumphs of the 'enemy, and the afflictions of the church, tempt men to 'think that the eye of Providence is closed or turned away ; 'or that the Almighty hath ceased to remember their sad 'estate. But the truth is, that God only giveth his people an opportunity of feeling their own insufficiency ; 'and waiteth till, by fervent and importunate prayer, they 'solicit his help. For so the holy Jesus slept while the 'ship was covered with the waves ; until, awakened by

'the cries of his disciples, he arose to their assistance, and 'spoke the tempest into a perfect calm.' (Horne.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The church of God is one incorporated body from the beginning to the end of the world : and the benefits conferred on it in every age, will be acknowledged with gratitude by believers, through all generations, and even to eternity. "Whatsoever things were written of old time, "were written for our instruction" and encouragement ; and parents should declare the work of God to their children, that they may learn to hope in him. When we hear of the wonderful works wrought for Israel, in bringing them out of Egypt, and settling them in Canaan : or of the still more glorious interpositions of God, in the first promulgation of the Gospel ; we should learn to hope and pray for displays of his power and love, equally efficacious, though not so directly miraculous. The prosperity of the church has always been attended with the ruin of her enemies ; therefore the most prosperous despisers and persecutors have cause to tremble on account of the prayers of God's afflicted people. As human policy, power, and authority could never prevail against the cause of God ; so they have been very little employed in promoting it : but whatever instruments have been used, all real advantages have been gained by "his right hand, his arm, and the "light of his countenance, because he had a favour to his "people." They give him the whole glory of the past, and entirely confide in him for the future : and they prosper in their spiritual warfare, when they depend on his grace and go forth in his name. Where the word of this King is, there is power : when he commands deliverances for Jacob, they will take place : and we may "push down all "our enemies, and tread them under that rise up against "us ;" when, like the servants of God of old, we disclaim all self confidence, to trust in him alone. The Lord hath always hitherto saved his people : and they may now "boast in him all the day long ;" and they will praise his name for ever, for not having made them ashamed of their confidence. Yet the believer must have seasons of temptations, afflictions, and humiliating discouragements ; and the church must have seasons of persecution, when her remaining witnesses prophesy in sackcloth. At such times the people of God will be run down, put to shame, plundered, murdered, banished, enslaved, despised, and reproached : and they will be ready to think that he hath cast them off, and to fear that his name and truth will be eventually dishonoured ; whilst they continually hear the blasphemies and triumphs of his enemies. But in all our afflictions, especially in our sufferings for the sake of scriptural christianity, we should complain unto the Lord, and exercise ourselves to have a conscience void of offence: we should be careful not to seek relief by sinful compliances; and should continually meditate on the power, truth, purity, and knowledge of our heart-searching God. If our heart turn back from him, or our steps decline from his way, he knows and will discover it to others. But if we are faithful to our engagements, and are persecuted for righteousness' sake, we are and shall be safe and happy. Even if we should be so given up into the hands of enemies, formidable and venomous as dragons, and thrown into dungeons hideous as their holes; be sore broken with every torture that malice can invent, and live in the continual expectation of a violent death: yet nothing can separate us from the love of our God; none can go beyond his purpose and permission; and in all these things we shall be more than conquerors; (Rom. viii. 35—39.) For though he seem to hide his face, and to forget the affliction and oppression of his people, whilst they are trampled in the dust by antichristian persecutors: yet he is waiting for our more fervent prayers, which will cause him, as it were, to awake, and arise, and help, and redeem us for his mercies' sake. We have reason to be thankful, considering our frailty, for exemption from the more violent species of persecution: but let us be careful, that prosperity and ease do not render us cereless and lukewarm: we should remember that persecution may come on us speedily, and that we ought to prepare for it: and we should not forget the state of the church, not yet delivered from her bondage and captivity. But in answer to the Redeemer's intercession and the prayers of his people, all that hate his cause shall be put to shame; truth and righteousness shall every where triumph; and none that belong to Christ shall be cast off for ever, but every one of them shall be completely and eternally saved.

NOTES.

PSALM XLV. Title. The word Shoshannim signifies lilies, and is several times so rendered in Canticles; as used, however, in the titles of a few psalms, it is generally understood to mean an instrument of six strings.— This psalm is entitled “A song of loves;” and it evidently describes the mutual love which subsists between Christ and his church. In many respects it resembles the Song of Solomon; and it treats of this spiritual union under the allusion of a marriage. Most expositors maintain that it was written on Solomon's marriage with Pharaoh's daughter, but a great part of it is inapplicable to that transaction: nor is there sufficient ground to support the decided opinion, that this was so much as the occasion of its being written, or that David composed it. The latter is indeed probable; but it is wholly a prophecy of Christ, and is quoted as such by the apostle. (Heb. i. 9.)

V. 1. The inspiration of the Holy Spirit stirred up in the prophet's heart this meditation upon so good a subject, as water bubbles up in a fountain: so that he spake freely of the things which he had been considering and had composed about the King, the promised Messiah; and his tongue was guided by the Spirit of God, as entirely as the pen is by the hand of a ready writer, to express promptly and fully his meaning, and nothing more.

V. 2. In speaking of the King, the prophet was led abruptly to address his discourse to him; as one in a rapture, whilst he contemplated his glorious excellencies: for he unspeakably surpassed all, whoever were admired or extolled on earth, for wisdom, justice, truth, and love; without having any intermixture of infirmity or defect. His word reveals the unsearchable riches of his grace: and being authorized to speak to sinners, as their Prophet, in the Father's name; “Grace is poured into his lips;” and his words are full of energy, instruction, persuasion, and consolation: and being in every respect fully qualified for his mediatorial work, God hath exalted and blessed him for ever, in order to the completion of it. ‘His word instructed the ignorant, resolved the doubtful, comforted the mourners, reclaimed the wicked, silenced his adversaries, healed diseases, controlled the elements, and raised the dead.’ (Horne.)

V. 3—5. The prophet here joyfully foretels the progress and success of the Messiah, in setting up his kingdom and overcoming his enemies. Gird with the word of truth, rendered effectual by the power of the Holy Spirit, as with a sharp sword, he rides forth as a conqueror, in unrivalled might, glory, and majesty, to spread truth, meekness, and righteousness on earth; bringing his people into a state of acceptance and peace with God; and teaching them to live in humble meekness, peace, and equity with each other. His right hand, expert in this warfare, readily executes his purpose, whether of mercy or vengeance. His arrows of conviction are very sharp, and the effects of them are very terrible for a time in the hearts of sinners, till they are humbled, subjected, and reconciled: but the arrows of his righteous vengeance are unspeakably more sharp and dreadful to his obstinate enemies; when they fall under that power to which they refused to submit.

V. 6, 7. The victorious Conqueror is here placed upon his royal throne: the prophet not only celebrates him as far superior to all the sons of men, but as being himself the eternal God. His everlasting kingdom, which he possesses for the benefit of his church, is administered with perfect wisdom and equity: his character, doctrine, precepts, and above all, his atonement, show that he "loveth righteousness and hateth iniquity." Therefore God the Father, as his God, in respect of his human nature and mediatorial offices, hath given to him the Holy Spirit, without measure; that, being thus anointed to be our Prophet, Priest, and King, he might have the pre-eminency in the gladdening gifts and graces of the Holy Spirit the Comforter; and from his fulness might communicate them to his fellows, his brethren in the human nature. Various attempts have, in different ages, been made to explain away this decisive testimony to the Deity of Christ; but the manner in which the apostle quotes it, rather varied from the Septuagint and made more energetic, is conclusive to all who admit his authority. Some would render the words, "God is thy throne for ever and ever." Heaven is the throne of God; but who ever heard of God being the throne of any of his creatures? (Note, Heb. i. 8, 9.)

V. 8. The garments of princes were generally imbued with costly perfumes: those of the high-priests were anointed with the holy ointment, composed of the spices here mentioned, with several others. Thus the Messiah is represented as clothed with garments which diffuse a refreshing fragrant through his royal palace, his church on earth and in heaven, in which he more rejoices, than magnificent princes do in palaces inlaid with ivory.—

'From the glorious vestments of our High-Priest and King, is diffused the sweet savour of his heavenly graces, filling those happy regions of joy and gladness, where he keeps his residence above, and, by the communication of his Spirit, refreshing the faithful on earth with their odours.' (Horne.)

V. 9—11. The King, now seated in majesty and glory on his throne, is next represented as surrounded with a splendid train. Among the other honourable women, the daughters of kings are mentioned, who may be supposed to have submitted to his authority, and put themselves under his protection; and who would deem it an honour for their daughters to wait in his court around his queen: whilst she, arrayed in the costliest robes, stood at his right hand, as a bride adorned for her nuptials. By the queen, the collective body of believers seems to be intended, who, clothed in the righteousness, enriched by the bounty, and adorned by the graces of the Spirit of Christ, adhere to him in singleness of affection and fidelity, and are admitted to the most endeared union and communion. The other attendants, mentioned here and elsewhere, (12. 14.) are either introduced, according to the customs of the times on such occasions, to keep up the allegory; or they may mean distinct churches or individuals who in succession seek to be admitted into this sacred relation. The royal consort is next exhorted, as it seems, by the Father himself, to hearken, consider, and consent to the terms of this union; and in order to enter into it, and act properly in it, she must forget her own people, and her father's house. The whole church, composed of Jews and Gentiles, consists of such as were born in sin; and separated from all idolatry, iniquity, and self-dependence; and from all their carnal interests, pleasures, and attachments of an unconverted state, must make way for receiving Christ as their whole Portion and Salvation. (Note, Gen. xii. 1.) When grace hath thus prepared the heart, there is a spiritual beauty with which the Redeemer is greatly delighted; and the soul is ready to submit to him as Lord, and to worship him as God, with unreserved obedience and humble adoration; as well as to cleave to him in love, and trust in him as a Saviour.

13 * The King's daughter is ^v all glorious within: ² her clothing is of wrought gold.
 15 ^d With gladness and rejoicing shall

V. 12. The accession of the Gentiles to the church may be here predicted, under the name of Tyre, a neighbouring city, and at that time the mart of the world: for even the richest among the nations will in due time submit, and consecrate their wealth, to the Messiah.

V. 13-15. The relation in which the believer stands to the Lord, comprises in it every tie and affection; and the church is called spouse, sister, or daughter, indiscriminately: or the title of spouse or bride, may refer to the Son of God; that of daughter, to the Father. Her glory and beauty are inward and spiritual: and her adorning is most precious; as she is arrayed with the righteousness which Christ wrought out in human nature for her justification, and with the beauties of a holy conversation by the operation of the Spirit of God; who works by the labours of the ministers, and by all the means, which others diligently use, to promote the sanctification of themselves and of their brethren. When the church is thus prepared, this union is begun on earth, which will be completed and avowed in the King's palace above: whilst every individual, whose affection and dependence have been singly placed on Christ, shall be admitted as a guest at these nuptials, and likewise share for ever in the joy and honour of this sacred union. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 16. While the church forgets and renounces all worldly connexions, interests, and affections, in order to her espousal to Christ, a spiritual progeny, a numerous succession of converts, arises from this new and sacred relation. These are "kings and priests to our God, and reign even on earth," as in reality the most honourable persons in every land: many of them have been raised to great authority, and have possessed great influence in their several countries; and, however the church hath hitherto been generally despised and persecuted, the time is coming when her sons shall be made kings and rulers through all nations, as well as heirs of an eternal kingdom in heaven.

V. 17. This verse shows, that Christ and the Church were immediately and expressly intended throughout the psalm. The language is peculiarly emphatical; and can mean nothing less, than all successive generations to the end of the world; and likewise eternal ages in heaven. Either the Father himself thus declared his purpose of glorifying his beloved Son and his people with him, for ever; or, as many explain it, the Psalmist foresaw, that this sacred poem would be used by the church through all generations, in celebrating the honour of the Redeemer, and in calling on others to do the same; and that it would thus be useful in preparing the redeemed people of God for the exalted adorations of the eternal world.—There can be no doubt, but that this will be verified by the event.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1-9.

The difference of men's characters before God greatly consists in the thoughts which habitually occupy each of their minds. The lively believer has his memory, imagination, and affections, so stored with heavenly things, that he has commonly some good matter to meditate upon, in those hours of solitude and leisure, which others waste in vanity, or employ in wicked and polluting speculations. But no subject is so congenial to the heaven-born soul, or so replete with comfort and instruction, as the contemplation of the excellences of Christ our King. Lively thoughts of his Person, character, and grace, springing up in the heart, inspire a heavenly savour into the discourse: and without the gift of prophecy, our tongues in this case become as the pen of a ready writer, simply declaring to all around us the suggestions of the Spirit of God. In the Redeemer, the enlightened soul perceives unutterable goodness and beauty, which eclipse all the dim excellences that it was wont to admire in the children of men. The gracious words which he speaks to sinners, are replete with divine harmony, and excite ineffable comfort in the broken heart; and Christ himself rejoices in his exaltation, and the power and glory which the Father hath conferred on him; because he delights in bestowing on his people the blessings which he purchased for them on the cross. All, who have seen his glory and tasted his grace, wish well to his cause: they rejoice in his former victories, and long to see him ride forth in his majesty to extend his conquests, and by his word and Spirit, to reduce enemies and strangers to a willing submission to his truth, and righteousness, and gentle dominion. But whilst he delighteth in salvation, his powerful right hand will teach him to execute dreadful vengeance on all his impenitent opposers: his sharp arrows will penetrate their souls; and all must either yield to, or be crushed by, this almighty King. For his throne is established for ever: his name is Immanuel: his sceptre is swayed in justice and mercy: he loveth righteousness and hateth iniquity; and whilst his Spirit leads believers to look unto Jesus, as "bearing our sins in his own body on the tree," and to rest all their hope on his atonement; the views they receive of this great transaction, especially impress them with a sense of the odiousness and desert of every transgression, of the reasonableness of obedience, and teach them the beauty of holiness; so that not one of them can possibly abuse his grace for an encouragement to continue in sin. In proportion as we are conformed to his holy image, we may expect the gladdening influences of the Comforter, which is communicated from his fulness: and whilst his name is to us “as ointment poured forth;” the fragrantcy of heavenly affections will recommend our conversation to the spiritually minded, and render us meet for his palace above.

V. 10—17.

Next to the Redeemer’s excellencies, those of his espoused church are most worthy to be celebrated: not for what she was in herself; but for what he hath made her, in consequence of his love and choice. If we desire to share these blessings, we must hearken to his word, consider his proposals, and incline our ears and our hearts to seek a union with him: we must renounce, and even forget, our carnal and sinful attachments, pursuits, and connexions, if we would be pleasing in his eyes, or be admitted into this honourable relation. Other lords must be disavowed; for he must be our Lord as well as our Saviour: and all idols must be thrown away, that we may give him our whole heart, and render him unreserved worship, as well as seek all our happiness from him alone. Indeed the true believer’s privileges, as well as the most estimable parts of his character, are internal, and undiscerned by an ungodly world: yet the holiness of his conversation proves the inward adorning of his soul, and that he is arrayed with the robe of righteousness and salvation. No wonder that the prosperity of the Redeemer’s cause, and the conversion of sinners to him, delight all those on earth, who are pure and upright in heart; seeing that angels, who never sinned, rejoice over one sinner that repenteth: what then will be the joy, and mutual congratulations, and harmonious praises, which shall attend the final admission of all the redeemed to the full possession of their purchased inheritance! They who are taught of God, however great in the world, will count it their honour to attend upon Christ our King, and to employ their wealth and influence for the good of his church. And they who leave all for him, shall be abundantly compensated even in this world, in new and spiritual relations, friends, and honours. To be a child of God, to be espoused to Christ, and made an heir of heaven, are the highest of all possible distinctions: this honourable race shall be continued and multiplied until the end of time; and at length possess and fill the earth: and thus shall the name of the Redeemer be remembered in all generations, and his people praise him for ever and ever, Amen, and Amen.

NOTES.

PSALM XLVI. Title. As the sons of Korah were principal singers in the sanctuary through successive generations, the title alone does not determine the date of this psalm. It is not known by whom, or when, it was written: but the ancient opinion, that it was composed on occasion of the deliverance of Jerusalem from Sennacherib’s invasion, is very probable: though some think it was composed by David, after his victories over the Ammonites and Syrians. It is, however, well adapted to the use of the church, especially in great emergencies, in every age.—When Luther received any discouraging news, he used to say, come let us sing the forty-sixth psalm.

Alamoth. (Note, 1 Chr. xv. 20.) ‘Alamoth is thought to be either some tune in common use, or some kind of musical instrument, unknown to us; in which young virgins, as some fancy, took a peculiar delight, and were wont to learn to play upon it, which they make the reason and original of its name.’ (Bp. Patrick.) Alamoth signifies virgins.

V. 1—3. (Note, xxvii. 1—3.) The clause, “a very present help in trouble,” may be rendered more literally, “found exceedingly a Help in troubles;” or, “a Help most readily to be found in troubles.” The Psalmist’s experience and that of all believers from the beginning evinced it: and this encouraged his present unshaken confidence. Earthquakes, and other terrible convulsions in nature, are often made emblems of the raging of nations, the fall of empires, revolutions, and other public calamities. But if imagination should be employed to conceive of such desolations as are not likely to be realized in the full literal import of the terms here used, till the consummation of all things; still the presence and power of an almighty Protector and Upholder would suffice to secure the church and every true member of it: and strong faith would exclude terror even in the prospect of such tremendous scenes.

V. 4. Perhaps the gentle streams which watered Jerusalem may be alluded to: but the River of the water of life, the graces and consolations of the Holy Spirit, which pervade every part of the church, the city of our God, and through his sacred ordinances revive and rejoice the hearts of afflicted believers, are particularly intended.

V. 6. Nothing can be more concise, energetic, and sublime, than this verse. Many deliverances afforded Israel, answer the description, especially that under Hezekiah: but the success of the Gospel, notwithstanding all opposition, which melted away before the blessing of God on the preaching of the apostles and evangelists, was a singular accomplishment of it; and it shall ere long have a still more glorious completion, in the destruction of every antichrist, and the universal prevalence of genuine Christianity.

V. 7. 'The LORD of armies, the God of Jacob, who redeemed him from all evil, is with us, his descendants, according to his promise: what then have we to fear?' — IMMANUEL, GOD WITH US, is in every age the Refuge and Protector of his church.

V. 8, 9. The Psalmist here calls on all people to contemplate the wonders which God had wrought for his church, and the desolations he had made among her powerful enemies: for he had made wars to cease to the ends of the earth, by disabling all who had delighted in them. He will hereafter put an end to all wars by the universal success of the Gospel of peace; and this event also may be foretold.

V. 10. God himself here speaks, and demands attention and submission from the whole earth; and that they should all acknowledge and bow down to his universal, everlasting, and absolute sovereignty, if they would escape his awful vengeance.

will find him a ready and a present Help. If our faith were as strong as our security is good, we need fear no combination of enemies, no revolutions in kingdoms, and no convulsion in nature; but in the most tremendous dangers, might triumph in the fullest assurance of security and victory. Were we literally to behold the deep rooted mountains torn from their foundations and cast into the ocean, whilst its impetuous waves overflowed the banks, and deluged the earth, we should not only be safe, but might be happy, if, in communion with God, we drank of the river of divine consolations which he hath communicated to his holy church on earth, as an earnest of heavenly joys. Let us then pray for increase of faith, and be careful to lay up our treasures in heaven: thus, when the earth and all its works shall be burnt up, we shall have nothing to fear or to lose. Happy are they, in every case, who are enrolled citizens of the holy city of our God, in which he dwells, as a Father, a Defender, and a Comforter of his people. Though whilst the heathen rage, their faith and patience may be tried, He will utter his voice, their enemies will perish, and they shall triumph in his praise. But let the ungodly tremble at beholding the destruction of those who have opposed the church: soon the Lord will convert or destroy every adversary; and the nations shall beat their swords into ploughshares, and learn war no more. Let us pray for the speedy approach of these glorious days; and in silent reverence and submission worship and trust in our almighty Sovereign. And through life and in death, let us answer every fear with, "The LORD of Hosts is with us, the God of Jacob is our Refuge."

of Christ; the psalm has been applied to his ascension, after his humiliation on earth, to the right hand of God in heaven. Thus the ancient fathers understood it, and on this account it is appointed in our Church to be read on Ascension-day. Numbers being assembled, as at a solemn festival, the Psalmist calls on them to express the overflowing joy of their hearts, by clapping their hands, and lifting up their voices in triumphant shouting: because the most high God, whom Israel worshipped, and who protected Israel, was terrible to his and to their enemies, and the great Sovereign of all the earth. In the days of Joshua, and afterwards by David, he had subdued the nations of Canaan and the adjacent countries, and brought them under the dominion of Israel, but these victories were only shadows of the spiritual triumphs of the church under her king Messiah; and at length all nations shall either be joined to her in subjection to Christ, or shall be destroyed. (Dan. ii. 44.)

V. 4. The goodly land of Canaan was selected for the inheritance of Jacob's posterity, who were especially favoured of God, and comparatively the excellent of the earth. But they have long been excluded from that country, which typified the present privileges and chosen inheritance of the true Israel, who are in reality what the Israelites were in external character.

V. 5. "God is gone up, by the special token of his presence, into the holy place, with shouts of joy and praise." (Bp. Patrick.) If, however, we consider this as prefiguring the ascension of Him, in our nature, who is "God over all, blessed for evermore;" and the acclamations of the heavenly hosts on that grand occasion; the whole appears vastly more interesting, and becomes in the highest degree animated, and appropriate as introductory to the repeated call to fervent praises.

V. 6. Our King, &c. (Psalm xlv. 1. 5.) The Messiah is continually celebrated in the psalms as Israel's King; it is therefore most natural to interpret this expression of him in almost every part of them; which leads us to multiplied proofs that he is JEHOVAH, and the Lord of all.

V. 8, 9. The dominion of that God, who dwelt in the holy place, by the ark, the symbol of his presence, above the mercy-seat, over the nations of the earth, as here mentioned, seems a clear intimation of the calling of the Gentiles into the church in consequence of Christ's ascension. (Rom. xv. 12.) All the principal persons, from the several tribes of Israel, "the people of the God of Abraham," assembled to remove the ark, leaving the protection of their houses and families unto God, who accordingly was the shield of the land. Thus, when princes and rulers join themselves to the Lord Jesus, and use their authority and influence for the benefit of the church, God is greatly exalted, in becoming the Shield and Defender of their dominions. Some, however, interpret the last clause, to mean the rulers themselves; who, belonging to God, having their authority from him, and, using it according to his command, become the shields of their people; and thus by their means God is greatly exalted and honoured among men.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The universal and absolute sovereignty of our holy God would be most terrible to every sinner, were it not exercised by his incarnate Son from a mercy-seat: but now it is only terrible to the obstinate workers of iniquity. Whilst his peculiar people express their confidence, gratitude, and joy, by every token of external exultation, and animate each other in his service: let sinners submit to his authority and accept of his salvation, that they may share in his holy triumph. If we be the chosen people of God, and his love and grace have made us more excellent than our unbelieving neighbours; we may be sure that He hath chosen for us a more excellent inheritance than all the kingdoms of the world; and that he will prepare our souls for that inheritance, by every dispensation here on earth. Let us then confide in his wisdom, submit to his will, and be thankful for his distinguishing mercy. As angels and glorified saints worshipped the ascending Saviour, and welcomed him with shouts of joy and the trump of God, surely we on earth should join our praises with holy affections, and with understanding of his excellency and our obligations, that we may glorify him and edify others also. Our backwardness to this reasonable service must be overcome by repeated exhortations; and when our hearts are attuned to this holy worship, we should call on all around to unite in it: for he is our King, and the King of all the earth. He reigneth upon the throne of his holiness, which yet well consists with his plenteous mercy: all the heathen are his inheritance and property; may he hasten the time, when all kings shall serve him, and use their delegated authority to his glory! Then will all the families of the earth be blessed in him, and he will be greatly exalted: whilst as the God of Abraham, he becomes their "Shield, and exceeding great Reward."

NOTES.

PSALM XLVIII. V. 1. Many think that this psalm was composed on account of the deliverance of Jerusalem from the power and rage of Sennacherib: but others are of opinion, that it is more exactly descriptive of the invasion of the land, during the reign of Jehoshaphat, and the extraordinary triumph of him and his subjects over the kings which had confederated against him. It is, however, evident that it was occasioned by some remarkable interposition of God in rescuing the mountain of his holiness from powerful assailants.

V. 2, 3. The situation of Zion, and the adjacent region, was very beautiful, and the glory and joy of the whole land: but the peculiar honour of this holy city was the experience of her kings from age to age, that God was their Refuge and the Protector of their palaces. Zion is supposed by many to have been situated on the south side of Jerusalem: but the temple stood on the north side of the mountain, and was its peculiar honour and distinction.

V. 4—7. The confederated kings of idolatrous nations were assembled to besiege Jerusalem: but the pious princes of Judah confided in God as their Refuge. Their invaders therefore, when they approached the walls, were suddenly intimidated, troubled, and put to flight with terror and anguish, as a woman in travail; or as the affrighted mariners look at each other, when a furious east-wind drives their stout and richly laden ship upon a rock, and dashes it in pieces. These effects could not be so much ascribed to a survey of Jerusalem's fortifications, as to the immediate power of God; even as the winds and waves are at his command. 'Illustrations of this kind are sometimes introduced, by the sacred writers, without the mark of comparison. The meaning evidently is, that as the east wind shatters in pieces the ships of Tarshish, so the divine power struck the heathen kings with terror and astonishment.' (Horne.)

5 They saw it, and so they marvelled; ^m they were troubled, and hasted away.

10 ^a According to thy name, O God, ^y so is thy praise unto the ends of the earth: ^b thy right hand is full of righteousness.

V. 8. The princes and people of Judah had often heard reports of the wonderful deliverances which God had in former ages vouchsafed to Israel, as well as the encouraging promises and predictions sent to them by the prophets: but the recent events, of which they had been eye-witnesses, and the astonishing interposition of the God of armies in behalf of his chosen city, impressed them with a far more lively sense of these things, than they ever before had attained to: and they were also encouraged, by this instance of the Lord's faithful and powerful protection, confidently to expect, that he would establish Jerusalem in safety and prosperity through all generations. As a prophecy, this must mean that city of the living God, of which Jerusalem was but a type; for Jerusalem was repeatedly taken, and at length it was given up to be trodden under foot by the Gentiles: but the church of Christ is founded on a Rock, and God will certainly establish it for ever and ever.

V. 9. Or 'We have waited in silent contemplation and patient hope for thy loving kindness, with sacrifices and believing prayers, presented at thy temple, trusting in thy aid, and not in our own power or valour.' This was the conduct of Hezekiah, amidst the menaces and blasphemies of Rabshakeh and Sennacherib; yet the conduct of Jehoshaphat and his subjects seems more exactly to accord to these words, than even that of Hezekiah. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 10. The name of God may, in this connexion, either mean, the glorious perfections by which he was known to his people, and distinguished from all the idols of the heathen; or his title, as the LORD of hosts, the God of Abraham, and the God of Israel. (Marg. Ref.) In both respects, the powerful protection afforded his people, and the righteous vengeance executed by his right hand on their insolent and impious invaders, would tend to make his praises celebrated through the whole land, and indeed to the ends of the earth.

PSALM XLIX.

The Psalmist calls on all mankind to attend to his instructive strains, 1—4. He shows, that the righteous need not

V. 11. This verse is in the future tense, and may literally be rendered, “Mount Zion will rejoice, and the daughters of Judah” (the other towns and cities dependent on Jerusalem) “will be glad, because of thy judgments,” &c. as an anticipation, during the apparent danger, of victory and exulting praises, rather than as a subsequent exhortation. (2 Chron. xx. 19—22.)

V. 12, 13. The people are here called upon to go round the city in solemn procession; and, while they joyfully praised and blessed the Lord, to mark all the towers, walls and palaces, observing that not one of them had been in the least injured by their formidable invaders. This would tend the more deeply to impress their minds; and prepare them faithfully and diligently to preserve the memory of these interesting events, for the benefit of future generations. Yet it seems not to have been necessary to have taken this exact survey of Jerusalem’s walls and fortifications to be transmitted to posterity, had these been any thing more than types of more permanent privileges; and if they had not been speedily to be demolished, that the things signified by them remain for ever.

V. 14. This verse, as the conclusion of a psalm, in which temporal deliverances, security, and privileges, might appear to be exclusively celebrated, is a strong intimation, that spiritual and eternal blessings were also meant. It was before said, that God would establish Jerusalem for ever: but it is here added, in the most emphatical language imaginable, “This God,” who protects Jerusalem, “is our God,” or the Friend and Patron of his true people; and this “for ever and ever,” or “to all eternity:” “He will be our Guide unto death;” through all the sorrows and dangers of this world to the eternal blessings of heaven. (Heb. xi. 14—16.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The Lord is a great and glorious King, and worthy of universal and most exalted praises: but none on earth will render him this due honour, except the citizens of the spiritual Jerusalem, who worship him in the mountain of his holiness, as their God and Saviour. The beauty and glory of his church, which should be, and will eventually prove, the joy of the whole earth, are derived from his presence and love, and are the reflection of his uncreated excellencies. Wherever there are princes or people who make fear in evil times, 5. He exposes the vanity of trusting in riches, 6—13. He contrasts the condition of the prosperous ungodly man with that of the believer, especially in respect of death and the resurrection, 14—20.

God their Refuge, there he will be known as such: for he will never disappoint the expectation of any who hope in his word. But, when kings and nations, however numerous and potent, confederate against his church, sudden terror and destruction will be their portion. We have heard and read of the works of God for Israel of old; and in the establishment of the Gospel upon the ruins of idolatry: and if we wait for his loving-kindness in his holy temple, by persevering faith and prayer, we shall experience in our measure the same powerful supports and deliverances: and still more glorious things shall at length be accomplished, in order to establish the church throughout the whole earth.—The Lord will always act consistently with those glorious perfections which, by means of his word, are made known and celebrated to the ends of the earth: the salvation of his people will be accompanied with righteous vengeance on his enemies; but every true believer may rejoice because of his judgments. Let us then diligently examine and accurately mark, the security of the everlasting covenant, confirmed by the word and oath of the immutable God: let us consider that his church is built upon a rock, against which the gates of hell shall not prevail; and let us meditate upon his exceedingly great and precious promises, and the privileges enjoyed by every true believer. Whilst we are thus encouraged by them to trust and serve the Lord in perilous and difficult circumstances; let us point them out to our children, and to the rising generation: for this Almighty and gracious God is the Portion and the Shield of every true Christian, through successive generations and to all eternity. He will guide us all, through life to death, and through death to glory; and, in the city of our God above, we shall enjoy uninterrupted and unalloyed peace and felicity.

NOTES.

PSALM XLIX. Title. The author of this psalm is not known; ‘But whoever composed it, it is likely he had in his eye the unreasonable thirst of mankind after riches, and their insolence when they have acquired them; which, it is possible, was a great discouragement to some pious but poor people in his time.’ ‘And, therefore, he indited this psalm to check that vanity, by setting death before their eyes,’ &c. (Bp. Patrick.)—It is not improbable that David wrote the psalm, and gave it to the sons of Korah; though the title may mean that it was ascribed to the sons of Korah.

V. 1—4. The Psalmist in these verses sublimely introduced his subject, by demanding an audience from the whole human race to a message which he would deliver unto them from God ; and his important and universally interesting instruction, being written in the sacred Scriptures, has already been proposed to innumerable multitudes, and will at length be heard by all the inhabitants of the earth, whether of noble or ignoble birth, whether rich or poor. As the Prophet of God, he had first inclined his ear to his divine Instructor : and finding the subject difficult, because of the corrupt prejudices, aversion, and inaptitude of the mind of man to such spiritual subjects, and to require the closest attention in order to a right understanding and explanation of it ; he had carefully meditated on it before he spake ; and then he had formed it into poetry, and set it to music ; that sacred melody might be the vehicle of weighty instruction.

V. 5. The old translation seems to give the true sense of this verse : “ Wherefore should I fear in the evil days, when iniquity shall compass me about, as at mine heels.” “ What cause is there, that I should be troubled with fears, and cares, and anxiety of mind, in calamitous times, when the iniquity of those who endeavour to supplant me hath surrounded me on all sides, and left me no way to escape them ? ” (Bp. Patrick.) In the judgment of the best critics, among whom Bishop Lowth is one, the word, rendered as a substantive my heels, is a participle signifying my supplanters. “ The purport of the question is plainly this : Why should I give way to fear and despondency, in the times of calamity, when the wickedness of my wealthy and powerful adversaries compasses me about to supplant and overthrow me ? ” (Horne.)—When the consequences of a man’s sins overtake him, and he has no way to escape, he may well fear : but the believer has no occasion to fear the power or subtlety of his most malicious persecutors.

V. 7. A ransom. That is, an atonement, expiation, or propitiating sacrifice : for this is the literal meaning of the word. They who glory and trust most in their riches, cannot with all their wealth satisfy divine justice, so as to ransom their nearest relative or best beloved friend, from death, to which he is sentenced by the righteous Government of the world.

V. 8. Precious. ‘ Rare, or not to be found, as prophecy was precious in the days of Eli.’ (1 Sam. iii. 1.) The price of redemption, whether of the life or soul, was too high for any mere man to pay : so that the ancient fathers referred the verse to Christ, in this sense, ‘ No man can redeem his brother, he alone excepted, who is also God.’ (Marg. Ref.) ‘ Even a Jewish interpreter understands these words of the King Messiah, who, having died for the redemption of his, afterwards liveth for ever, as was predicted by Isaiah.’ (Is. liiii. 10.) (Horne.)

V. 9. ‘ As long as the world endureth, this will be a vain endeavour.—Let a man attempt it, if he will, upon himself. Can he prolong his own life,—that it shall be ‘perpetuated and never dissolved.’ (Bp. Patrick.) And if this be a vain attempt, who can redeem or save his own immortal soul from the awful sentence of eternal punishment ?

V. 10. Every man may see, that the wise and learned of the world die in the same manner as the foolish and stupid : and they who have prospered in heaping up wealth, leave it all behind ; perhaps to those for whom they never intended it, and who rejoice at their death.

V. 11. ‘ Various are the contrivances of vain men, to have their names written on earth, and to procure, after death, an imaginary immortality for themselves and their families, in the memory and conversation of posterity ; which is not often obtained, and if obtained is of no value : when with less trouble they might have secured to themselves a blessed immortality in the kingdom of the Redeemer.’ (Horne.)

V. 12. The word, rendered abideth, signifies to lodge all night. Man’s continuance in the world resembles a traveller’s lodging at an inn, whence he removes in the morning. So soon must wealth and honour be relinquished, and the most honourable men die like the beasts that perish ; except as distinguished by an immortal soul, and a future state of righteous retribution.

V. 13. Some render the first clause, ‘This their way is their confidence,’ meaning a rash and presumptuous confidence. ‘Yet so close does this folly stick to mankind, that they who succeed in their possessions make no benefit of this observation; but are as very fools to themselves, and tread in the steps of those who went before them.’ (Bp. Patrick.) Indeed, they not only copy their example, but imbibe their principles and adopt their maxims, as admired dictates of wisdom.

V. 14. The most powerful and prosperous are soon crowded into the grave, as the sheep into the slaughter-house. There death feeds upon them, in silence and darkness, until the morning of the resurrection: then the poor oppressed believers will have the dominion over their haughtiest persecutors. The grave will consume all the glory and beauty of the wicked, which they possessed in their splendid earthly habitations; and meanness, deformity, and contempt will be their portion; whilst “the righteous shall shine forth as the Sun in the kingdom of their Father.”—The word translated repeatedly the grave, is often rendered hell, and probably means the unseen state, whether of body or soul.—‘Christ’s coming is the morning, when the elect shall reign with Christ, as Head over the wicked.’ Then all the beauty, splendour, and external decoration, which the most admired of the ungodly and affluent showed in their palaces, will appear withered and gone; and they will be in all respects loathsome and contemptible.

V. 15. When the believer dieth, his soul redeemed by the Saviour’s blood, is received to glory: the life of his body shall also be restored; it shall be redeemed from the power of the grave, refined and rendered incorruptible, and glorious. The Psalmist in this verse expresses a full confidence, both that his soul would be preserved from hell, and his body raised from the grave; being received by the Lord to be for ever with him. Leave this out; and what does the solemn exordium of the psalm introduce? for no other important distinction, in respect of happiness, between the righteous and the wicked, is so much as mentioned.

V. 16, 17. ‘Be thou not troubled or dismayed, who-soever thou art that hearest or readest this, when thou seest a worldly man grow very rich, and great honours heaped upon his family; which enables and emboldens him perhaps to use the meaner sort contemptuously.’ (Bp. Patrick.) When he dies ‘nothing shall attend him but his shroud to the grave, and his works to the judgment-seat. View him in this light, (and this is the proper light to view him in) and he will cease to be the object of fear or envy.’ (Horne.)—Worldly men count wealth and magnificence their glory: but holiness, being the moral image of God, is the true glory of our rational nature; and this will accompany us to heaven.

V. 18. Prosperous sinners count themselves happy, and promise themselves much enjoyment for many years to come: and such is mankind, that they who succeed in ambitious or covetous pursuits, or who live in luxury and splendour, will be sure to find foolish and selfish admirers and flatterers.

V. 19. Death will convey one generation after another from the light of this world; and how awful are the words, “They shall not see light for ever!”

V. 20. He that in prosperity has not understanding to use the gifts of God to his glory, but abuses them in wickedness, willingly renounces the grand distinction between a rational creature and the beasts that perish. As to this world, he gratifies his appetites and inclinations, and dies as they do: but “after death is the judgment.”

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The important truths which relate to the eternal state of the righteous and the wicked, are equally interesting to all the inhabitants of the earth, “both high and low, rich and poor together.” Blessed be God, they are plainly proposed to us in his holy word; and had it not been for man’s dislike to such subjects, they would have been universally heard and understood.—“At the call of folly, what multitudes are always ready to assemble! But Wisdom, eternal and essential Wisdom, crieth without, she lifteth up her voice in the streets; and who is at leisure to attend her heavenly lectures? The mouth of Jesus always spake of wisdom; but few regarded him: the meditation of his heart was ever of understanding; but it was accounted madness.”—(Horne.) We should however still endeavour to illustrate and enforce these important instructions, by every method which can soften prejudice, or gain attention: especially by showing their influence on our own hearts in mortifying covetousness, ambition, envy, and discontent; in raising us above the fear of man, and rendering us constant and cheerful, in doing the will and professing the truth of God, amidst the successful enmity of

The almighty God, comes in awful majesty from Zion, to judge his people, in the sight of the assembled world, 1—4. He commands that the saints be gathered to him; and declares that the heavens shall declare his righteousness, 5, 6. He delighteth not in legal sacrifices, but in spiritual worship, 7—15. persecutors or oppressors. How general, yet how absurd and infatuated, is it, for men to boast of their riches and trust in them! to pursue them as the one thing needful, if they have a prospect of acquiring them, and to repine and murmur, if they have not! Yet it is most evident, that wealth can neither prolong the life nor save the soul of the possessor, or his most beloved relatives: and had not the ransom of the death of Christ intervened, the body of every sinner must have finally been left in the grave and his soul in hell; for the redemption was too precious to be otherwise effected, and must have been let alone for ever. And as we see that neither wealth nor worldly wisdom will exempt any man from dying; and that all such acquisitions must shortly be relinquished for ever: how vain are all our anxious cares and labours! What good will it do any man, to have his name perpetuated on earth, when he hath no name in the registers of heaven? Thus foolish are the thoughts and ways of ungodly men. Yet one generation after another applaud their maxims: and the character of a fool, as drawn by heavenly wisdom itself, continues the favourite model for imitation, in the judgment of a vast majority even of professed Christians! (Marg. Ref.) Death alone can convince men in general of the folly of laying up treasures upon earth: and were there no future state, the most wealthy and honourable would soon be levelled with the beasts that perish: but in the prospect of the resurrection and of eternity, the most prosperous of the wicked are infinitely more wretched and base. In this light, let the believer view the riches and the children of this world, that he may not be tempted to envy or impatience, or to fear evil consequences to himself and to the church of God, when sinners grow rich and honourable. Soon will they die, and carry nothing away with them of all their splendour and magnificence. Though they foolishly congratulate themselves, and others applaud them, as having done well for themselves; yet they are going to the generation of their fathers, and shall never see light; "for to them is reserved the blackness of darkness for ever." But the real Christian, when he dies, bids farewell to sin and sorrow; his soul is received to glory; his body shall be redeemed from the grave, and raised incorruptible and glorious. His inheritance is in heaven; and in the resurrection he will sit in judgment on those who here oppressed and persecuted him. And is there a rational creature that can prefer the lot of the rich sinner to that of poor Lazarus? (Notes, Luke xvi. 19—31.) And is this more than brutish stupidity universal to the human race, if left to themselves? What need then have we of revelation and of the teaching of the Holy Spirit; when, with all our boasted powers, we are prone to such iniquity, in the most important of all concerns! O Lord, deliver us from the love of the world, and teach us to set our affections on things above!

NOTES.

PSALM L. Title. "Hezekiah commanded the Levites to sing praises unto the LORD with the words of David, and of Asaph the seer." (2 Chr. xxix. 30.) Hence it appears that Asaph was a prophet, and wrote some psalms, and probably this among the rest. Some expositors, however, are of opinion, that Asaph the seer, was a different person from Asaph the Levite, and one of the chief singers in the days of David; that he lived at a later period; and that it is not unlikely he was contemporary with Hezekiah, and referred in this psalm to the hypocrisy of the Jews in general, even during Hezekiah's reformation. But at whatever time the psalm was composed, the instructions contained in it are of general importance and utility. It is a most sublime poem; which is generally supposed to predict the coming of Christ, the abolition of the Mosaic dispensation, and the introduction of Christianity; with the condemnation of the Jews, especially of the Scribes and Pharisees, for rejecting it. But the judgment executed upon Jerusalem prefigured the awful proceedings and consequences of the general judgment: and the Scribes and Pharisees are the parents of a numerous progeny of superstitious, formal, and hypocritical professors and teachers of Christianity, who will be condemned at that solemn day.

V. 1, 2. In the preceding psalm all the inhabitants of the world were addressed in the name of God; but here the mighty God (or, the God of gods,) JEHOVAH himself, is introduced with inexpressible solemnity; and all the inhabitants of the earth, as well as his people Israel, are summoned to attend. His august tribunal, however, is not placed on mount Sinai, whence he delivered his fiery law; but on mount Zion, where his glory was manifested, above the mercy-seat and the ark of the covenant, which prefigured his gracious Gospel. Accordingly Zion is here called "the perfection of beauty:" as reflecting the uncreated glory and excellency of JEHOVAH, who thence shines forth in the perfect harmony of all his divine attributes. Indeed, the words perfection of beauty may be referred to God himself; who appears in the Gospel at once infinitely glorious and infinitely lovely. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 3. God is said to keep silence, when he exercises long-suffering, and does not immediately punish men for their sins. Thus he long bore with the provocations and hypocrisy of Israel: as he still bears with the corruptions and abominations of professed Christians; and with the wickedness of mankind in general. But the time was approaching when he would no longer keep silence, but would come to execute vengeance on the guilty: and though his tribunal would be placed in Zion; yet his coming would be attended with those terrible displays of majesty, justice, and holiness, with which the law was given from mount Sinai. Thus when Christ came among the Jews, though in the character of a Saviour, they could not “abide the day of his coming;” and his righteous indignation, like unquenchable fire, burnt up the chaff; that is, he destroyed by awful judgments the bulk of the nation, which persisted in rejecting him. But his second coming to judge the world, to perfect the salvation of his people, and to punish the wicked, will be attended with still more tremendous displays of his power and justice; especially against such as neglect, oppose, or abuse his Gospel. (Marg. Ref.)—“The Jewish rabbies affirm the subject of ‘this psalm to be, that judgment which will be executed ‘in the days of Messiah; ignorant, alas! that they themselves, and their people, are now become the unhappy ‘objects of that judgment.’” (Horne.)

V. 4-6. All the inhabitants of heaven, as well as earth, shall be summoned to witness the proceedings of their omnipotent Sovereign, and they will all concur in declaring that his decisions are perfectly wise and righteous. The whole human race indeed must appear in judgment: yet the professed worshippers of God, who have his oracles and ordinances among them, are chiefly spoken of, in all the descriptions given us in Scripture of that solemn season: because these descriptions were especially given for their instruction, warning, and encouragement. The saints may mean those who are really such, and who are interested in the new covenant, through the sacrifice of the great Redeemer. These were separated from among the unbelieving Jews, before vengeance was executed on the nation: and they will be gathered together by the holy angels previously to the condemnation of the wicked at the last judgment. (Marg. Ref.) But some think that professed saints are meant, who trusted to the national covenant with Israel through the appointed sacrifices, and were at length to be convicted of substituting a form, instead of the power of godliness. As “the “Father judgeth no man, but hath committed all judgment to the Son;” we cannot mistake the person of whom it is said, “For God is Judge himself.”

V. 7-15. The Israelites in general confided and gloried in their relation to JEHOVAH as their God. And indeed they were peculiarly favoured by him, and were bound by every tie to worship and serve him only, and to expect their happiness from him. But this external profession, when insincere, could not secure them from his wrath: nay, God, even their God, would speak and testify against them. They were also prone to place their chief dependence on the legal sacrifices, without attending to their import, or offering them in a proper frame of mind: thus they mistook the shadow for the substance, and at length were condemned for that perverse mistake, when they persisted in rejecting the Messiah: for these sacrifices, when thus offered in unbelief, pride, and hypocrisy, were abominable to God: (Note, Isaiah i. 11-15.) To lead their minds therefore to an attention to the more inward and essential parts of religion, and to prepare them for a more spiritual dispensation, they were here informed that the Lord’s controversy with them would not be about the omission of sacrifices, except as that arose from perverseness and rebellion. The time was approaching, when He would take no bullock or he-goat from them, requiring none but spiritual sacrifices. They could not be so gross as to suppose that he wanted their cattle, as he was the sole Proprietor of all things; or imagine that he would eat the flesh of bulls or drink the blood of goats! Such sacrifices therefore could not be acceptable to him, except as expressions of faith and love. On the other hand, a humble thankful heart, disposed to worship and praise God, and to fulfil the engagements implied in the profession of being his people, as well as the vows they made in the day of their distress; and to confide in him and seek help from him in trouble by earnest prayer, were sacrifices suited to his holy nature. This spiritual worship springing from a penitent believing heart, and connected with humble submission and obedience, was the grand substance of true religion, even under the Mosaic dispensation; and would be the substance of that which was about to succeed: and worshippers of this character would be accepted and delivered, and would render glory and praise to God for temporal mercies and eternal salvation. This passage was evidently intended as an intimation, that the ceremonial law would be abrogated at the coming of the Messiah; as well as an encouragement to prayer and praise.

V. 16—21. Multitudes of the strictest professors and teachers of the Jewish Church, were not only superstitious and formal, (and so either blind guides or blindly led,) but even atrociously wicked; and yet they cloaked their crimes with apparent zeal. Thus in all ages many love the credit of being Christians, and the dignity of instructors, who hate instruction; and many deal in the word of God with their lips, who pour contempt upon it in their lives. And whilst they zealously plead for some parts of divine truth, they secretly, nay, perhaps openly, indulge themselves in lewdness, dishonesty, and in wicked and deceitful conversation, and the basest slander and calumny, especially against those who are strictly conscientious, and such pious persons as, being near to them, put them to shame by their example. Nay, in this manner they often excuse, and even think they have compensated for, their crimes, by their earnestness in promoting what they suppose to be the cause of God. But the righteous Judge disdains such vile hypocrites, and abhors their religious profession and preaching, even worse than their theft, adultery, and lies; because they tend more to disgrace the Gospel, and to prejudice or deceive the souls of men. "What have they to do to declare his statutes, or to take his covenant in their mouths?" His cause needs not such helpers; he never set them to work, and they must expect his vengeance as their recompense. Such were the scribes and chief priests, who were scrupulously zealous about externals, whilst they were full of rapine and covetousness; and were seeking to murder the holy Jesus, by bearing false witness against him before Pilate, in the most atrocious manner. Now the whole of this strange delusion arises from an abuse of God's long-suffering, and a wilful mistake of his character and the intention of his Gospel: as if the methods of his grace, the doctrines of his word, or the ordinances of his worship, were substituted in the stead of a holy life, and afforded men the license to indulge their lusts with impunity. But as the Jews of old were reprov'd, convicted, condemned, and punished with the most dreadful severity, on these accounts: so will all the superstitious, formal, hypocritical, enthusiastic, or antinomian abusers of the Gospel, when the day of judgment shall come and the secrets of men shall be judged by Jesus Christ.

V. 22, 33. The Psalm concludes with warning all of every description, who forget God, (which is the cause of every fatal error and daring crime,) to consider the account which they must give, and to flee from the wrath to come; for if the Almighty appeared as their enemy, no deliverer could possibly be found: and with encouraging the upright to offer their humble tribute of grateful praise; with which God will be glorified through the promised Redeemer, notwithstanding their deficiencies: and in a circum-spect and conscientious conversation, to wait for a fuller discovery and experience of God's salvation; or to look for the coming of their promised Saviour. According to the concluding words of these verses, no man ordereth his conversation or conduct aright, who trusts in his own works, and does not seek the salvation of God; none seeks that salvation properly, who is not conscientious in his whole conduct; and none, who unites the two, fails of salvation. The Latin version is very striking. 'Him that disposes, or regulates, his conduct, I will cause to enjoy my salvation.' The preventing grace of God leads a man, like Cornelius, to regulate his conduct piously and uprightly, and to wait for God's salvation in this way; and the promise ensures to such a person the enjoyment of that salvation. What a noble view does this psalm give then of God and of Revelation! God stands forth as the

David earnestly prays for mercy, humbly confesses his sins, and laments his original depravity, 1—6. He entreats forgiveness, sanctification, and renewed comfort, that he may glorify God and promote the conversion of sinners, 7—15. He shows that God delights more in a contrite heart than in legal sacrifices, 16, 17. He prays for the prosperity of the church, 18, 19.

Parent, and Lord, and Judge of all: exercising an universal providence, soliciting us to make him our refuge, to worship and serve him, promising us his reward and favour. And in that very volume of Scripture which enjoins so many ceremonies, how little intrinsic value is there ascribed to them, compared with spiritual worship and ordering the conversation aright!

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—15.

The almighty and eternal JEHOVAH hath spoken to men from mount Sinai as a Lawgiver, and from mount Zion as a Saviour: and ere long he will speak to the whole human race from his righteous tribunal. That solemn season will be to sinners “the day of wrath, and of the revelation of the righteous judgment of God,” whilst heaven and earth shall approve the sentence denounced against them. But they who have been favoured with the blessed Gospel, in which the beauty and glory of all the divine perfections shine forth from the face of Jesus Christ; and who have neglected or abused it, will hear the most tremendous doom. Happy they who are saints indeed; who have acceded to the covenant of grace by faith in the Redeemer’s atoning sacrifice, and who have shown the sincerity of their love by the fruits of righteousness! these shall first be severed from among the wicked, and announced heirs of eternal life. But let us beware of resting in any form: even divine truths and institutions may be held and attended on in unrighteousness; and God will testify against his own professed people, who trust to their privileges, and frequent his ordinances in pride, superstition, or self-righteousness. He demands the heart, and will not be put off with an unmeaning external observance: how then can human inventions please him, when repentance, faith, and holiness, are neglected?—We cannot offer unto God any thing which he hath not bestowed upon us, or any thing that can profit him: so that the notion of meriting from him is replete with ignorance as well as arrogance. As the Jews and their costly oblations were abhorred, when they rejected him of whom Moses and their prophets had written; so will the ordinances of Christianity and even moral obedience be rejected, if substituted in his place: and no spiritual services can be performed, except by faith in him and the supply of his spirit. To be sensible of our own indigence, dependence, and unworthiness; to seek every thing from the all-sufficient God by faith and prayer; to render him the tribute of a thankful heart; to perform the vows implied in baptism and the Lord’s supper; and to call upon him in every time of trouble, as our only Refuge and Friend, are reasonable sacrifices, and suited to him, who “is a Spirit, and seeketh such to worship him, as worship him in spirit and truth.” They who thus worship, glorify God: and every answer to prayer, received with gratitude, forms an earnest of their eternal salvation.

If ignorant formalists, though not grossly immoral or profane, are under a dangerous delusion, what will be the doom of those who understand, profess, and preach the truths of God; attend on and even administer his ordinances, and speak of his everlasting covenant: whilst they hate instruction, despise his commandments, and are companions with thieves, adulterers, liars, slanderers, and false swearers? Yet how many such professors and teachers of Christianity disgrace the present age!—How many such scandals are found even among those who are zealous for the doctrines of grace! And how strangely are they connived at, and enabled to keep up their confidence, as if the Judge of the world were altogether such an one as themselves! Indeed, their present impunity emboldens them to expect that they shall always escape. But the Judge will come and will strip off their masks, and reprove, convict, and condemn them: he will set in order before them, and publish to the world what they have done; He will say to each of them, “See what thou hast wrought,” whilst the pages which record their crimes shall be read to their confusion; and they will be speechless, when sentenced to “depart into everlasting fire, prepared for the devil and his angels.” Let us then judge ourselves and beware of hypocrisy; let ministers see to it, that they preach first to themselves. and love and practise their own instructions: let every one inquire, whether he be indeed “allowed of God to be put in trust with the Gospel;” or whether he run without being sent? Now it is evident that God abhorreth, and will never allow of, those who presume to declare his truths, whilst they are living in the love and habitual practice of gross sin, and take pleasure in those that do; and then slander and revile their more pious brethren, because not of their party, and because their example puts them to shame. If any have hitherto been thus forgetful of God, or given up to wickedness, let them consider their urgent danger: for if the Judge appear against them, who then can rescue them from his almighty indignation? He now warns, that he may not hereafter punish: let us then thankfully embrace his Gospel, and praise him for his mercy: and endeavouring to glorify him in word and deed, wait for his complete and eternal salvation.

NOTES.

PSALM LI. Title. (Notes, 2 Sam. xi. xii.) When Nathan had delivered his message, we may suppose that David retired to his chamber full of confusion, remorse, and anguish; and there poured forth his soul before God in unreserved confessions and fervent prayers. And, considering his rank, his age, and a variety of circumstances relating to his family, to persons disaffected to his government, and to his character among the surrounding nations, it might have been thought expedient for him to have been satisfied with these secret acts of contrition and devotion; with humbling himself before God by fasting and prayer; and with “bringing forth fruits meet for repentance.” Especially as God had already remitted the sentence of temporal death, to which the law condemned him. But he viewed the subject in another light, when brought to reflect seriously on his conduct and its probable consequences. The honour of God and of true religion was deeply concerned, and with it the best interests of vast multitudes: nor did there appear any other way in which the bad effects of his crimes could be so thoroughly prevented, as by his publicly taking the deepest shame to himself, for having acted directly contrary to that holy religion which he professed. Whatever might be the consequences to himself and his reputation, (zeal for the glory of God and love to his people having now revived and gained the ascendancy in his heart, united with deep self-abhorrence, and a kind of indignation against himself,) he seems to have resolved, without delay, to publish to his family, his subjects, the world at large, and all future generations, the judgment which, in the sight of God, he now entertained of his late behaviour, in the substance of his secret confessions and supplications, and the way in which, with deep anguish and distress, he sought forgiveness and salvation. He therefore not only composed this psalm for his private use, or to show to his friends, or leave among his writings: but he gave it to the chief musician, that it might form a part of the public Psalmody at the tabernacle, and in consequence be circulated through all the land, and among other nations; and continue in the church, with his other sacred poems, for the instruction and warning of mankind in all future ages. Nothing can well be conceived more humiliating than such a measure; nothing could more decidedly show how much he preferred the honour of God to his own credit; in short, nothing could more clearly manifest the depth of genuine repentance.

V. 1, 2. The mercy of God, his loving-kindness, his tender mercies, the multitude of his tender mercies, form the only plea, which the royal penitent admits in seeking forgiveness of his heinous crimes. He does not once mention his former services in the cause of religion; or palliate his conduct, by the peculiar temptations of his high rank, and the customs of princes; or plead that he was inadvertently betrayed into it, and led on by imperceptible degrees, step by step: but as a vile and miserable sinner, with many repetitions, he dwells on the only cheering thought his case allowed of; and entreats, that God would, “to the praise of the glory of his grace,” forgive his sins; as a debt that is remitted is blotted out. And as the stain was beyond expression deep, that he would thoroughly wash and cleanse it all away. The language is taken from the washings and purifications of the Mosaic law; and shows that the Psalmist here fervently prayed to be cleansed from the pollution as well as the guilt of his sins; that he was aware no outward forms or endeavours of his own could effect this cleansing; and that he sought the blessing through the redemption and grace of the promised Saviour. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 3. (Note xxxii. 1—3.) While David endeavoured to cover his sins, (to conceal or excuse them,) he could not sincerely and heartily seek forgiveness from God as an act of entirely unmerited mercy and grace. And this seems to have been his state of mind before Nathan came to him: but now “being come to himself,” he is deeply conscious of his most heinous guilt; and confesses it openly and ingenuously, with all its aggravations: nay, the remembrance of his complicated baseness seems to haunt him continually, and his conscience incessantly reproaches him: so that he can by no means exclude the most distressing reflections. Thus he “submits to God’s righteousness,” owns he deserves to perish, and is prepared, if spared, to ascribe the whole honour of his salvation to the rich mercy and grace of God alone. (Notes, Luke xv.)

V. 4. ‘It is thy prohibition, O God, that can make a sin. I have sinned against men, but it is thy law that I have violated; in that is my offence.’ (Bp. Hall.) ‘If thou shouldst pronounce the heaviest sentence upon me for my crimes, and execute it with the greatest severity, I could not accuse thee of too much rigour; but would still justify thee in thy proceedings, and clear thee from all such unjust imputations.’ (Bp. Patrick.) David’s crimes had deeply injured Bathsheba, Uriah, Joab, and the other accessaries to Uriah’s murder, the men slain with him, their families, and the nation; and they were likely to occasion most fatal consequences in various ways, to vast numbers: yet the chief malignity of his conduct consisted in this, that it was a complication of the most daring rebellions against the great and glorious Governor of the world; contempt of His majesty, excellency, and righteous law; a most ungrateful return for immense obligations; and an apostacy in heart from God, through idolatrous love of worldly pleasure. Indeed no words can express the heinousness and aggravation of his guilt in this view of it : and this view seems to have possessed and overwhelmed his mind to such a degree, as to make every other consideration appear comparatively as nothing. Even before the law was given, God himself stated that the grand malignity of murder consisted in its being an assault on man, whom he created in his own image. (Gen. ix. 6.) Crimes in civil society, which are injurious to individuals, are yet punished as violations of the laws of the land; done against the king and the peace of the realm; such are called 'Pleas of the Crown,' and high treason is the chief crime in every land. David indeed was not accountable for his conduct to any human tribunal; and though he had carefully concealed his transgressions from man, he was sensible that the Lord had witnessed the whole, and would bring it to light : he therefore found himself constrained to plead guilty to the most humiliating charges of guilt and depravity, against mankind without exception, which were contained in the word of God; for he was convinced that his base conduct, after all his peculiar advantages and zealous profession of religion, would abundantly justify those declarations of the entire wickedness of the human heart, and fully confute the blasphemous censures which ungodly men ventured to pass upon the government of God, and upon his denunciations and judgments, as if unjust and severe. Thus, in every sense, the case of David, when well understood, is suited to justify God in all his declarations, and to vindicate his whole government from every aspersion.
